SAW NAPOLEON'S ARMY RETREAT

A Centenarian Now Living in New York, Whose History is Interestiug

One hundred and five years old, Rabbi Barett Wolnisky, who on Sunday night at his great-granddaughter's marriage danced the wild steps of two Ruissian dances, performing this feat despite a lameness which compels him to wear one shoe with a sole an inch thicker than that of the other.

His eyes, that watched Napoleon's broken legions straggle westward again in the Russian snows ninety-five years ago, shone as brightly on fifty-four of Rabbi Wolnisky's descendants on Sunday night. His legs, which carried him briskly in bovish panic from the French soldiers in 1812, twinkled almost as merrily in Forsyth street in 1907, as he pranced with his great-grandchildren in the Zeide middle Einiklach and later broke into the wild rhpthm of the Komarishki.

The only thing that tried Rabbi Wolnisky on Sunday night was the length of time he had to go without his pipe. He smokes before he gets up he smokes after he goes to bed. He had plenty of tea at the wedding, where he preformed his remarkable terpsichorean feasts, however, and he needed it, for his daily quota is about forty big glasses, brewed strong, and taken without milk. He drinks no water and no liquor as a rule, though he takes both in times of emergency. One meal daily, consisting of soapbread and a little meat, is his only food, and is set for him at noon.

Born in Kobrine, in the State of Grodno, Russian Poland, he moved about with his parents in his early youth, and so came to see the icebeaten regiments of the Little Corporal falling back from Moscow. Marrying early, he settled in Antipole and traded in liquors, most of his life in Russian being spent in the wholesale liquor business. He prospered, and twelve children came to him and his first wife, who died before he left his Russian home for America about twenty-five years ago, with two sons, the first of his family to seek these shores.

Wolnisky's business ruin in Antipole began when Alexander II was assassinated in 1881. Alexander III, who was by nature inclined to mild measures, fell under the influence of the leaders of the old regime, and in a period of repression which the activity of the revolutionaries seemed to demand the Russian soldiery were more aggressive than ever.

Cossacks broke into Wolnisky's establishment in 1881, drank all they could swallow, and opened every barrel in the well-filledcellar. When they went on their way he was ruined. He at once determined to leave the country.

In the East Side here he was immediately recognized as a person of extraordinary learning, and he was elected rabbi of the Eldridge Street Synagogue, which place he held for many years, retiring only two years ago upon the death of his second wife.

Wolnisky's second wife was twenty-two years old when, at the age of sixty-five, he married her. They had fifteen children. He has ninety-two living direct descents, of whom fifty-four are in this city or state, or in New Jersey. The others are in Russia. His descends have been increasing at a rate of twelve a year for two or three years. He knows the name of every one of them and never forgets their birthdays.

He rises every morning at 4 o'clock and has a few glasses of tea and a pipeful of Mohoke tobacco, imported from Russia, for breakfast. He uses three pipes, one for the street, one for the house and a third for smoking in bed. This last has a big bowl and a long stem, the bowl resting on the floor. He has never been ill, but eight years ago was run down while crossing Canal street by a fire chief's buggy. A wheel passed over his ankle, breaking the bones, and when it healed that leg was a trifle shorter than the other, making it necessary to wear on it a shoe with a heavy thick sole—New York Herald.

A NECESSARY ADJUNCT OF WAR.

The Much Maligned Mule Has Many Advantages Over The Horse.

Mules furnish the propelling power for all army wagons. The horse is good enough for mounting cavalrymen and yanking artillerymen, but when it comes to the important matter of transporting army supplies there are only two animals in it—the mule and its driver.

The mule is a necessity, as well as a luxury, in war time. His advantages over a horse are legion. He is the type of toughness. He will do more work than a horse and live on less. As a pack animal he is far superior. He is like a camel in his ability to go without water.

The mule can live on dry leaves or almost any kind of provender and do good work. He will stand any kind or quality of abuse or hard usage and never murmur. His is the patience of job. He is somewhat stubborn and hard-headed, but the sense that is literally beaten into him is as useful to him and his employer as any other sense that can trot in mud knee deep all day without weariness, and he is a far better swimmer than the horse.

One can ride a well-trained mule into a well or up a tree. He is the sine qua non for a campaign through a mountainous region. As a war animal the mule has all these advantages and many others. Said an old veteran recently:

"A mule can discover water two miles off. And he will never fail to tell you about it. He will go if necessary for days without water, but he will let you know sure whenever he comes within two miles of it. His voice is not musical, but it is easy to understand. Again, his ears are not big for nothing. He is as watchful as a cat. Any unusual sound will awaken him. He can tell the tread of hostile steps or any movement of the enemy at any hour of the night, and he will never fail to let you know of it. As a pack animal, when his back has to be used in lieu of vehicles, the mule is the only animal. He will carry everything you put on him. He will travel with it forever. He will never break down. Wading marshes, swimming rivers, climbing mountatns—it is all the same to him. He fattens on hardship. Mules are used nearly altogether at army posts. They carry the couriers, pull the ambulances, plow the potato patches. A good mule team will pull the ambulances six miles an hour for 20 hours and never give a sign of complaint. Any one of them at the end of that journey of 120 miles will promptly elevate to the ceiling any man who will tickle his feet. While a mule can even stand cold better than a horse, his powers of endurance find best illustration in hot climates. He is a product of the Southern states. He is not as swift as the horse in an artillery charge, but he will pull these engines of war all day without fatigue. And he will listen to the roar of cannon without batting an ear. His nature is not musical. The sound of battle has neither terror nor charm for him. He stays where you put him and he raises the white flag never."

MR. CROTHERS' RECORD.

Many Facts Laid Bare to the People of Maryland.

When the State Democracy set the versatile pen of Paul Winchester going (after the proper oiling) they doubtless looked for home effective results from such an experienced and capable a source. If so, their chagrin must be pitiful. The mountain labored—the meuse has come forth in the shape of a series of circular letters now running in the Democratic organs of the State. Of course, Mr. Winchester is sorely handicapped in his efforts to let his genius work. The "nigger bugaboo" has grown most stale, flat and unprofitable and is only unable by fledgling orators of "young Mr. Gorman" stripe. The "White Man's Supremacy" shriek has been drowned in a general shout of derisive laughter from all intelligent quarters, and orators and authors alike have united in giving it a quiet but effective burial. Mr. Winchester was handicapped. He was expected to deliver the tale of the brick and behold no straw was given him. It was a painful dilemma and Mr. Winchester's solution of it has not served to allay the suffering. His first circular letter was devoted to assuring the people of the State that "not a dissenting voice is heard among Democrats." This was too much for the gravity of the managers, while the row on their back fence was filling the State with the feline cries of clashing Senatorial aspirants. Mr. Winchester was expected to take another tack. His second circular letter, however, has contributed once again to the gaiety of the State by a rather remarkable and altogether onesome attack on Mr. Gaither. Now, Paul Winchester, striving to besmirch the character of George R. Gaither is something like a pickaninny flinging mud-balls at the stars. They won't reach. If Mr. Winchester wanted a candidate within the range of his gun, —"a candidate of the earth earthy" (to borrow Mr. Rayner's characterization of Mr. Crothers) he might have found one in the person of the Democratic nominee for governor. Mr. Crothers' unfortunate illness (unfortunate that is for the Republicans) has shielded him, as nothing else could have, from a thorough exposition of a political career that has simply reeked with the thines for which the people are no longer willing to stand in public servants and public affairs. Mr. Crothers' repeated defeats in his own county are the direct result of the utter distrust the people have for him where he is best known. His early years and opportunities were promising enough, but each succeeding year of his public life saw him more and more emphatically repudiated in his home county, simply because his petty political tyranny, together with his utter want of reliability and sincerity aliented a large percentage of Cecil Democrats and threw the county into the Republican column. Governor Warfield carried that county by nearly 400 majority. A poll of the county reveals the astonishing fact that Mr. Crothers, altho "at home," will hardly succeed in securing any majority at all. And this, because where the people know his career, they have come to utterly distrust the man. In local matters he has been as hard to please as the proverbial Dutchman's flea. Pretty much everybody in Cecil, for example, has been recorded on one side or the other, in that county's numerous contests over local license. But Mr. Crothers has succeeded in hiding his attitude toward this question, even unto this day. When the infamous Octorara Water Bill was introduced in the State Legislature, Mr. Crothers stood before the people of his own neighborhood and asked them if they could believe him guilty of supporting a bill which would be the ruin of their flourishing industries and the looter of their most valuable assets. At the same time he had lobbied for the passage of the bill at Annapolis, appearing before the Committee as its earnest advocate. Whereupon the people of northern Cecil were outraged enough to moot him. When he was appointed to the honor by Governor Warfield he made a solemn promise to cut himself entirely loose from all political activity and associations. He redeemed the promise by keeping in the thick of every political movement, and (as a disgraceful climax) leaving his place on the bench while court was in session at Easton, to go home to Cecil for several days and take a hand in constructing the county slate and running the County Convention. On that night in Baltimore when the Democracy (rampant) notified Mr. Crothers (couchant) that he was to run for Governor, then it was that the nominee let himself loose on promises. But those promises can hardly square him with his performances. Take for example his expressions in favor of legalized primaries and direct nominations by the people. That was campaign buncombe which can hardly go down with his lobby record. Yes, Mr. Crothers has a lobby record—a quite long and a very active one. Indeed, he has been much engaged in this capacity in Annapolis for a number of years. Now at the last session of the Legislature, Senator France of Cecil (Mr. Crothers own county) introduced a bill for legalized primaries and direct nominations, appliable to Cecil county alone. It was a strictly local bill and was desired by many Democrats as well as Republicans in the county. And yet the "elections committee" refused to report it. It became evident that some hidden power was holding it back. Finally the Senator from Cecil demanded to know why it could not be reported, whereupon (according to his own statement) a member of the committee replied "We cannot report that bill; Mr. Crothers is opposed to it and wants a hearing on it." Needless to say the bill was never reported, but died in committee, and Mr. Crothers will find it hard to convince Cecil people that he favors legalized primaries and direct nominations.

Or take another illustration. In his speech of acceptance Mr. Crothers expressed the deepest sympathy with the working-man—indeed, he himself would have been a workman but for graver occupations. Now, let us see how much his record in the Senate shows sympathy with the men who toil. Turn to the session of 1901 and Senate Bill No. 6, and Mr. Crothers is recorded as voting against an amendment providing for assistance in voting to working men and day laborers and mechanics, being fifty years of age and upwards. Also against the amendment providing that "there shall be no taxation without representation, wherefore illiterates who pay taxes, shall be entitled to assistance, etc." In other words, the purpose of these provisions was to save the right of voting to men whose disadvantage in life had robbed them of educational opportunities but whose industry and thrift entitle them to the rights of good citizens, as much as the man who holds a diploma from a college. Mr. Crothers by his vote said "No." The workman must have all the manual dexterity, all the educational training required to vote the Chinese Puzzle ballot, or he cannot vote at all. This is the measure of Mr. Crothers' sympathy with the working man, and beside this record of his public acts, his public professions are only "airy nothings."

Or take another illustration. In his speech of acceptance Mr. Crothers pictures out a plaintive protest against political corruption. That's good, if it is sincere. And one hesitates to question its sincerity, for while the lamp holds out the burn, the vilest sinner may return; it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that Mr. Crothers has really experienced a change of heart. But one cannot help comparing this most virtuous declaration with some notorious chapters in his previous political career. The primary fight of 1903 in Cecil County is a case in point. No such open and disgusting venality was ever witnessed in the County as the Crothers people practiced to win that fight. Money was used so freely and in such large sums that the use of it was over-shadowed by the wonderment as to where it came from. Some said it came from a certain great corporation by which Mr. Crothers has been employed for years; others said it came from John Walter Smith, whose candidacy for the Federal Senate Mr. Crothers zealously supported. And so the speculations went. But certainly whatever source, the money came, and the county was flooded. If Mr. Crothers is now dead set against political corruption it is a notable conversion. The next thing you know John Walter Smith will be found amongst the penitents. And then what joy there ought to be in Heaven.

These few illustrations from Mr. Crothers' career may serve to enlighten the people of the State as they have enlightened the people of Cecil concerning Mr. Crothers' unreliability. If anyone is disposed to ask why such a man was placed at the head of the State ticket, the inquiring soul must be referred to the Honorable John Walter Smith, whose Herculean efforts at the pyschological moment, succeeded in landing the votes at the State Convention for his own, his very own, candidate. And if one is tempted to inquire further as to why Mr. Crothers should be the man whom Mr. Smith delighteth to honor, we beg to refer that inquirer to the days of the Extra-Session, when Mr. Smith was Governar and Mr. Crothers his right hand man in the Senate. There were two souls with but a single thought, in those days of disfranchisement doing, and their unholy alliance has never been interrupted since. Mr. Smith doubtless discovered then, that however little Mr. Crothers could be trusted in most things he could be thoroughly trusted to make this State a "one-party State," if "ways that are dark and tricks that are (hardly) vain," should not lose their efficiency in carrying elections.

ACCIDENT.

Mr. Daniel Hinebaugh, of Oakland, recently came through our village and made a very acceptable call at the public school here.

Rev. Zimmerman, of Canada, who has accepted a call to the pastorate of the German Lutheran church at this place, is here and making many warm friends.

Our merchants are getting in a fine lot of fall and winter goods.

Mr. Floyd Diehl and Miss Mattie Gies are now one, having been tied together by the skillful hands of Rev. H. C. Salem. The beautiful wedding took place at the bride's home last Sunday. They seem happy and we wish them a pleasant journey down the pathway of life.

Mr. Adam Richter is now housekeeping on the "Zinkin corner."

Miss Lillie Menhorn has returned from Salisbury, Pa.

The political candidates are busy handshaking and all of them expect to be elected or allow some one else to be elected.

The public school at this place is well organized and is doing splendid work under skillful management. The fourth grade in the primary room is about ready for promotion. The classes in geometry and algebra are reported to be excellent.

Mr. Diehl, of Grantsville, called at the home of J. C. Beahm last Sunday.

The nine young teachers in nearby schools all seem to be getting along splendidly.

Mr. Lawrence Speicher recently enrolled at the public free school and is doing good work.

Prof. Grupe is again teaching the German school. He is one of the few really cheerful men and proves himself an ideal educator.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1907. NUMBER 35

THERE IS DANGER IN OUR PRESENT PROSPERITY

President Roosevelt Issues His Thanksgiving Proclamation

HE FIXES THURSDAY, NOV. 28

Hopes Americans "May Not Fall Into Love Of Ease And Of Luxury," But Personify "Hardihood."

WASHINGTON, Oct. 26.—In his annual Thanksgiving proclamation, issued today, the President embraces the opportunity to preach a little sermon to the American people on the dangers of ease and luxury. He fixed Thursday, November 28, as Thanksgiving Day.

The Thanksgiving proclamation is as follows:

"Once again the season of the year has come when, in accordance with the custom of our forefathers for generations past, the President appoints a day as the especial occasion for all our people to give praise and thanksgiving to God.

"During the last year we have been free from famine, from pestilence, from war. We are at piece with all the rest of mankind. Our natural resources are at least as great as those of any other nation. We believe that in ability to develop and take advantage of these resources the average man of this nation stands at least as high as the average man of any other. Nowhere else in the world is there such an opportunity for a free people to develop to the fullest exrent all its powers of body, of mind, and of that which stands above both body and mind—character.

"Much has been given us from on high, and much will rightly be expected of us in return. Into our care the 10 talents have been intrusted; and we are to be pardoned neither if we squander and waste them, nor yet if we hide them in the napkin; for they must be fruitful in our hands. Ever throughout the ages, at all times and among all peoples, prosperity has been fraught with dangers, and it behooves us to beseech the Giver of all things that we may not fall into love of ease and of luxury; that we may not lose our sense of moral responsibility; that we may not forget our duty to God and to our neighbor.

"A great democracy like ours—a democracy based upon the principles of orderly liberties, can be perpetuated only if in the hearts of the the ordinary citizen there dwells a keen sense of righteousness and justice. We should earnestly pray that this spirit of righteousness and justice may grow ever greater in the hearts of all of us and that our souls may be inclined ever more both toward the virtues that tell for gentleness and tenderness, for loving kindness and forbearance one with another, and toward those no less necessary virtues that makes for manliness and rugged hardihood—for without these qualities neither nation nor individual can rise to the level of greatness.

"Now, therefore, I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, do set apart Thursday, the 28th day of November, as a day of general thanksgiving and prayer, and on that I recommend that the people shall cease from their daily work and in their homes or in their churches meet devoutly to thank the Almighty for the many and great blessings they have received in the past, and to pray that they may be given the strength so to order their lives as to deserve a continuation of these blessings in the future."

CROTHERS' RECORD AS COUNTY BOSS.

[From the Baltimore News.]

The News on October 23 published certain statements in connection with Austin L. Crothers' career, showing, with circumstantial detail:

His connection with a corrupt primary election in 1903, in which the banner precinct, so far as fraud is concerned, was one in which Crothers' own office was the polling place. In that primary there were 3359 votes cast, although at the election of the preceeding year the Democratic vote was only 2230. In Crothers' own precinct the vote in the primary was 845. The Democratic vote the preceding year was only 466. The following year, when an extraordinarily full vote was cast in that precinct, the Democratic vote was only 634.

His control as a political boss over county contracts let and and appointments made.

His demand for money in return for his influence in securing the granting of liquor licenses.

His connection with a liquor case smothered in the Grand Jury room at Elkton.

His work among negro voters and his connection with the attempted bribery of one of them.

His activity in politics while a judge on the bench.

His lobbying at Annapolis for the Octoraro water bill, an indefensible measure unquestionably inimical to the interest of his home county.

His defeats in his own county, when he himself was made the sole issue of the campaign.

Names, dates, figure and details were given in this statement. As yet no attempt to disprove them has been made.

Local Teachers' Institutes.

The executive board of the Garrett County Teachers' Association has decided to hold local institutes at the following named places at such times as may hereinafter be designated: Grantsville, Nov. 2; Kitzmillerville, Nov. 9. At Friendsville, Accident and Oakland, dates for which have not yet been fixed. While the above named places are especially designated on account of their central location, there is no reason why institutes should not be held in other localities. With a proper manifestation of the spirit of cooperation along educational lines we as teachers can make this the banner school year of Garrett county

FOR GAITHER AND THE REPUBLICAN TICKET

A Voter For Thiry Three Years Makes An Appeal.

THE ELECTION LAW THE ISSUE

An Old Resident Reviews The Extra Session of the Legislature and What Was Accomplished By It.—A Nefarious Scheme.

To the Editor of The Republican:

As the day for the battle of the ballots approaches, I am more firmly persuaded after careful survey of the matter, that the disfranchisement of our neighbors, friends and citizens, which has so degraded the politics of our State, is the one subject of paramount importance at this election. Our present abominable election bill, hatched in the moral blight of an extra session of the Legislature, must and shall be wiped from the statute books. This alone, I conscientiously believe, is good and sufficient reason for depositing our vote for George R. Gaither and the Republican ticket.

Certain it is, if we cherish the traditions our State, and have respect for the sacred and inalienable rights of its citizens, we will place ourselves on record as being unalterably opposed to the present legislation, or to any further political juggling having for its purpose and object, either expressed or implied, the disfranchisement of any class of our citizens. Let us pledge ourselves to do all in our power to put a decisive end to unfair election laws, have them repealed, and new laws passed instead, which will assure to us and our children that every voter may cast his vote in confidence, and that it will be honestly counted as the intention of the voter is expressed.

Just think a moment, my fellow voter, whether you be Republican, Prohibitionist or Democrat, what this nefarious Election Law cost us as taxpayers (and who are not taxpayers?). It was passed at the extra session of the Legislature at the enormous expense of over one hundred thousand dollars, and for what purpose? Simply and solely to cut out the poor man, who unfortunately cannot read and write, and to throw further obstacles in his way, that regardless of his intention, which may be plainly expressed by his mark, his vote may be cast away and lost. Now, is not this a blot on the fair escutcheon of our State, and a cursed wrong to noble manhood of our young, as well as to the exalted loyalty and patriotism of those who faced the enemy in time of battle, in defense of our country's freedom?

The extra session was ostensibly convened to correct certain alleged census inaccuracies. Every intelligent man knows that this was only a subterfuge; and a new election law to render almost nugatory the splendid law placed on the statute books by Republicans in 1896, was the sinister and all-controlling motive and design. This was then accomplished.

I have been a voter in this state for thirty-three years and have always kept in close touch with the political workings of both parties, and I will solemnly declare that in my opinion this election law, together with the manner of its passage is the most damnable act ever perpetrated by any party and foisted upon the people of this State. I consider it the one damning cloud that hangs over this grand old Commonwealth like a pall, and holds up in scorn the bosses of an old boss-ridden organization that would for selfish ends and purposes ruthlessly trample on the most sacred rights and franchises of its most loyal citizens. Bot, comrades of the Grand Army, who have carried the musket and knapsack, know what liberty and human rights mean. You have made the purchase and paid the price in blood. Can you longer lay supinely by and see the rights of yourselves, as well as those of your neighbors and friends, trampled upon election after election? Now is the time to rise up in arms and fight the battle of ballots. Now is the opportunity to have the wrongs righted. Now is the accepted time. Such an opportunity may never present itself again, may never again knock at your door. Believe me, if the Democrats are again elected to power, and if the Constitutional Amendment is carried, the present election law will be further emasculated, fewer safeguards will be thrown around the ballot box, and instead of fifty thousand voters losing their franchise, one hundred thousand will pay the penalty of permitting this opportunity to pass unheeded.

More than this, a stronger ticket than the one headed by Mr. George R. Gaither, a ticket commanding more respect, confidence and admiration was never nominated and placed before the voters of this State. Do not miss the opportunity of casting your vote on Tuesday, November 5th, for these men.

A VOTER FOR 33 YEARS IN DISTRICT NO. 8.

PROHIBITIONIST WANTS REPUBLICAN TICKET ELECTED

The Time Is Not Ripe to Sacrifice Votes.

DEMOCRATS OPPOSE TEMPERANCE

This Is Shown Conclusively By That Party's Action in Turning Down Mr. Joseph D. Baker for the Nomination for Governor.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Just a few lines in regard to the coming election on November 5th, and a few reasons why it is better to vote the straight Republican ticket.

We, as Prohibitionists, not only of Garrett county, but the whole State as well, should weigh very carefully our intentions to vote our own ticket this fall. We are gaining ground slowly, it is true, but the time is not ripe to sacrifice our votes for the cause which we so dearly love. If we gain prohibition that will prohibit, we must let the whole people to decide for themselves what they will choose. The two great parties, Democratic and Republican, have neither thus far shown the interest they might in our worthy cause, and it is for us to decide at this important election whether it would not be more advantageous to the cause of Prohibition for us to join in a united effort to defeat candidates who are presented to the voter simply by reason of their party's opposition to our cause, for example:

The people of Frederick county put up a man in whom they had great confidence for the nomination for Governor. The independent papers took him up and lauded his character and qualifications before the people as an excellent candidate for the Governorship. Then it came out that Mr. Baker was a man very much opposed to the liquor traffic and a man who would fight it with his whole being. He is opposed to its use, opposed to its sale, and even to its manufacture. Did Mr. Baker get the nomination? No! The liquor interests of the city and state came forth and said to the Democratic bosses, not to the people: "We won't have any of Baker; you must put up another type of man as your candidate." The result is we have a man who has been known all his life to the people of his own county as a Democratic ring politician, who ran his home county (Cecil) with a high hand. He is accused of corrupting the primary election of his own county in 1903, when his own office was used as a polling place; of his control as a political boss over contracts and appointments made in Cecil County, of working among the negro voters and attempting to bribe some of them, of being active in politics while a Judge on the bench, of smothering a liquor case in the grand jury room at Elkton, and demanding money for his influence in securing the granting of liquor licenses. This man was put up as a candidate for Governor and forced upon the voters of this State, not because the people wanted him, but because the Democratic bosses wanted him, and the liquor interests knew full well his past record and that they need have no fear of him. Is he a man to be trusted with the guiding of the ship of state for the next gubernatorial term. Would he not run the State as he did his county? As a proof of his unfitness for public office, the people of his own county defeated him for the State Senate in the years 1901 and 1905, the last named year by nearly 500 votes, which was about six times the plurality of the year 1901, showing that his unpopularity is rapidly increasing. If the people of his county won't trust him, why should the people of the State.

With this pronounced oppositiou to the question of Prohibition and the disqualification above quoted, would it not be better to cast our votes for George R. Gaither, the Republican candidate, and make doubly sure the defeat of our arch enemy. In additioe to this the Republican party in its platform gives us other reasons why it would be to the best interest of the people to elect their candidates.

We all know that the Democratic party is and always has been long on promises, but short on fulfillment, and the people will never get legislation of a high moral standard through them. This is clearly proven already, for they are responsible for the present disgraceful election law that was passed at the extra session of 1901, when $100,000 of the taxpayers' money was used in order to frame up an election law that would disfranchise them. A law that compels a man to travel from one to fifty miles to a county seat and swear he intends to become a citizen, in order that he may exercise his right to vote one year later. The Democratic party is the one responsible, my aged friend, for your disfranchisement. Because you have given your best efforts all your life in providing for your families, have toiled through heat and cold in order to get together a little property for your declining days, have kept up your taxes, have worked in all sorts and conditions of weather until your step is not so strong, your hand not as steady as it once was. They say to you through this outrageous result of the session of 1901, the present election law, if you make your mark a little too long or soil your ballot because your hands were not washed before you went into the booth to vote, your vote will not be counted. And after you have travelled forty miles to the court house to declare your intention to become a citizen, have covered ten miles the next year to register, and another ten miles on election day to vote the ticket of your choice, the law says that if your mark extends over the line or finger prints appear on your ballot, you are disfranchised as a result of this dishonorable, disgraceful and fraudulent election law placed upon the statue books of this State by the Democratic party.

Now on the other hand, the leaders of the Republican party have presented a man for Governor who would repeal this trick ballot law. The people all over the State demanded a man of high moral courage, a man who would not be a party to trickery and nebauchery of the ballot, a man who knew the needs of our State, a man who has had experience in public affairs, a man whose sole ambition would be for the welfare of the whole State, the upbuilding of the home and its influences and not the party to which he belonged, mind you, but the whole people, and they demanded the nomination of George R. Gaither for Governor. They saw in him the one man in all the State who would fill the bill.

We will grant for argument sake the possibility of his not being the selection of the Prohibition party, but seeing his excellent qualifications, and wishing to secure the election of a man who has not been opposed in any way to our cause, we should vote for him. He has made good in his public career. In all his dealings with the public he has been fair and honest. He is a city man, it is true, but when the sale of the Western Maryland Railroad was about to be consummated, he insisted and demanded that the counties who were interested in the sale should receive the same treatment as the City of Baltimore. Did they get it? Yes, they got it and that is one reason why Democratic Montgomery county is for Gaither. He has proven his interest in them.

The Republican candidates are pledged to the repeal of the trick ballot law, and a return to the simple ballot which was in vogue when every man's vote was counted as cast.

The Democrats tell us the law was necessary in order to prevent negro domination in Maryland politics. They say we must disfranchise thousands of worthy German, Irish and English citizens in order to prevent this misnamed Negro Bugaboo. If that was true, why did not the law apply to the whole State when enacted? Why did they select nine of the twenty-three counties only? Why select Garrett county with only twenty-four colored voters out of a total registered vote of 4169? Why Frederick county, where there are 13,000 registered voters, only 1200 are colored? The reason is plain: to disfranchise the negro, and as many Republicans and Prohibitionists as possible.

Mr. Gaither and his colleagues on the ticket have promised, if elected, to pass a law which will give every man a square deal. A law that will give to every veteran who gave the best years of his life to his country's cause and to every citizen and taxpayer the right to have his vote counted as cast, the right to have a say in the ruling of himself, and not to be ruled by a half dozen Democratic ring politicians, who run the State for their own conveniences and to intrench themselves deeper into power, and to appoint their own henchmen to office regardless of whether they have the necessary qualifications or not. All that is needed in their case is that they be organization men and a regular of the regulars.

I make this appeal, as I see no hope for accomplishing any good by a close adherance to our nominated ticket at this time. To do this only makes it possible for the election of the Democratic nominees and in the end whisky will be king and more honest voters disfranchised.

BODY FOUND ON RAILWAY TRACK

Frederick Mason, Employed As a Cook Here, Killed Near Rodamer, W. Va.

The remains of Frederick Mason, about 28 years of age, of Grand Rapids, Michigan, employed in Oakland as a cook in the restaurant of Walter Morrison on Railroad street, were found lying along the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Rodamer, West Va., early Saturday morning.

On Friday evening Mason left here and went to Cumberland, where he resided previous to locating in Oakland, intending to return on train No. 1, which, in reality he did, but was carried through to Rowlesburg, at which point he was given a train check by the conductor and was instructed to return here on train No. 4. It is presumed, however, that he boarded a freight train at Rowlesburg with the intention of coming here, but that at Rodamer he fell from the train and was killed.

His remains were shipped on Monday to Grand Rapids, Michigan, in which city his parents live, his father being engaged in the hotel business there.

CHAPTER XVII.
The Verge of a Quarrel.

Brant's mind was a chaos of conflicting emotions, but a single abiding conviction never once left him—he retained implicit faith in her, and he purposed to fight this matter out with Hampton. Even in that crucial hour, had any one ventured to suggest that he was in love with Naida, he would merely have laughed, serenely confident that nothing more than gentlemanly interest swayed his conduct.

Nevertheless, he manifested an unreasonable dislike for Hampton. He had never before felt thus toward this person; indeed, he had possessed a strong man's natural admiration for the other's physical power and cool, determined courage. He now sincerely feared Hampton's power over the innocent mind of the girl, imagining his influence to be much stronger than it really was, and he sought after some suitable means for overcoming it. He alone, among those who might be considered as her true friends, knew of her secret infatuation, and upon him, alone, therefore, rested the burden of her release. It was his heart that drove him into such a decision, although he conceived it then to be the reasoning of the brain.

And so she was Naida Gillis, poor old Gillis' little girl! He stopped suddenly in the road, striving to realize the thought. He had never dreamed of such a consummation, and it staggered him. What was there in common between that outcast, and this well-groomed, frankly spoken young woman? Yet, whoever she was or had been, the remembrance of her could not be conjured out of his brain. He might look back with repugnance upon those others, those misty phantoms of the past, but the vision of his mind, his ever-changeable divinity of the vine shadows, would not become obscured, nor grow less fascinating. Suddenly there occurred to him a recollection of Silent Murphy, and his strange, unguarded remark. What could the fellow have meant? Was there indeed some secret in the life history of this young girl?—some story of shame, perhaps? If so, did Hampton know about it?

Already daylight rested white and solemn over the silent valley, and only a short distance away lay the spot where the crippled scout had made his solitary camp. Almost without volition the young officer turned that way, crossed the stream by means of the log, and clambered up the bank. But it was clear at a glance that Murphy had deserted the spot. Convinced of this, Brant retraced his steps toward the camp of his own troop, now already astir with the duties of early morning. Just in front of his tent he encountered his first sergeant.

"Watson," he questioned, as the latter saluted and stood at attention, "do you know a man called Silent Murphy?"

"The scout? Yes, sir; knew him as long ago as when he was corporal in your father's troop. He was reduced to the ranks for striking an officer."

Brant wheeled in astonishment. "Was he ever a soldier in the Seventh?"

"He was that, for two enlistments, and a mighty tough one; but he was always quick enough for a fight in field or garrison."

"Has he shown himself here at the camp?"

"No, sir; didn't know he was anywhere around. He and I were never very good friends, sir."

The lieutenant remained silent for several moments, endeavoring to perfect some feasible plan.

"Dispatch an order to the telegraph office," he finally commanded, "to inquire if this man Murphy receives any messages there, and if they know where he is stopping. Send an intelligent man and have him discover all the facts he can. When he returns bring him in to me."

He had enjoyed a bath and a shave, and was yet lingering over his coffee, when the two soldiers entered with their report. The sergeant stepped aside, and the orderly, a tall, boyish looking fellow with a pugnacious chin, saluted stiffly.

"Well, Bane," and the officer eyed his trim appearance with manifest approval, "what did you succeed in learning?"

"The operator said this yere Murphy had never bin thar himself, sir, but there wus several messages come fer him. One got here this mornin'."

"What becomes of them?"

"They're called fer by another feller, sir."

"Oh, they are! Who?"

"Red Slavin wus the name he give me of thet other buck."

When the two had disappeared, Brant sat back thinking rapidly. There was a mystery here, and such actions must have a cause. Something either in or about Glencaid was compelling Murphy to keep out of sight—but what? Who? Brant was unable to get it out of his head that all this secrecy centered around Naida. Perhaps Hampton knew; at least he might possess some additional scrap of information which would help to solve the problem. He looked at his watch, and ordered his horse to be saddled.

It did not seem quite so simple now, this projected interview with Hampton, as it had appeared the night before. In the clear light of day, he began to realize the weakness of his position, the fact that he possessed not the smallest right to speak on behalf of Naida Gillis. Nevertheless, the die was cast, and perhaps, provided an open quarrel could be avoided, the meeting might result in good to all concerned.

Hampton welcomed him with distant but marked courtesy, having evidently thought out his own immediate plan of action, and schooled himself accordingly. Standing there, the bright light streaming over them from the open windows, they presented two widely contrasting personalities, yet each exhibited in figure and face the evidences of hard training and iron discipline. Hampton was clothed in black, standing straight as an arrow, his shoulders squared, his head held proudly erect, while his cool gray eyes studied the face of the other as he had been accustomed to survey his opponents at the card table. Brant looked the picture of a soldier on duty, trim, well built, erect, his resolute blue eyes never flinching from the steady gaze bent upon him, his bronzed young face grave from the seriousness of his mission. In both minds the same thought lingered—the vague wonder how much the other knew. The elder man, however, retained a better self-control and was first to break the silence.

"Miss Gillis informed me of your kindness to her last evening," he said, quietly, "and in her behalf I sincerely thank you. Permit me to offer you a chair."

Brant accepted it and sat down, feeling the calm tone of proprietorship in the words of the other as if they had been a blow. His face flushed, yet he spoke firmly. "Possibly I misconstrue your meaning," he said, with some bluntness, determined to reach the gist of the matter at once. "Did Miss Gillis authorize you to thank me for these courtesies?"

Hampton smiled with provoking calmness, holding an unlighted cigar between his fingers. "Why, really, as to that I do not remember. I merely mentioned it as expressing the natural gratitude of us both."

"You speak as if you possessed full authority to express her mind as well as your own."

The other bowed gravely, his face impassive. "My words quite naturally bear some such construction."

The officer hesitated, feeling more doubtful than ever regarding his own position. Chagrined, disarmed, he felt like a prisoner standing bound before his mocking captor. "Then I fear my mission here is useless."

"Entirely so, if you come for the purpose I suspect," said Hampton, sitting erect in his chair, and speaking with more rapid utterance. "To lecture me on morality, and demand my yielding up all influence over this girl—such a mission is assuredly a failure. I have listened with some degree of calmness in this room already to one such address, and surrendered to its reasoning. But permit me to say quite plainly, Lieut. Brant, that you are not the person from whom I will quietly listen to another."

"I had very little expectation that you would."

"You should have had still less, and remained away entirely. However, now that you are here, and the subject broached, it becomes my turn to say something, and to say it clearly. It seems to me you would exhibit far better taste and discrimination if from now on you would cease forcing your attentions upon Miss Gillis."

Brant leaped to his feet, but the other never deigned to alter his position.

"Forcing my attentions!" exclaimed the officer. "God's mercy, man! do you realize what you are saying? I have forced no attentions upon Miss Gillis."

"My reference was rather to future possibilities. Young blood is proverbially hot, and I thought it wise to warn you in time."

Brant stared into that imperturbed face, and somehow the very sight of its calm, inflexible resolve served to clear his own brain. He felt that this cool, self-controlled man was speaking with authority.

"Wait just a moment," he said at last. "I wish this made perfectly clear, and for all time. I met Miss Gillis first through pure accident. She impressed me strongly then, and I confess I have since grown more deeply interested in her personality. I have reasons to suppose my presence not altogether distasteful to her, and she has certainly shown that she reposes confidence in me. Not until late last night did I ever suspect she was the same girl whom we picked up with you out on the desert. It came to me from her own lips and was a total surprise. She revealed her identity in order to justify her proposed clandestine meeting with you."

"And hence you request this pleasant conference," broke in Hampton, coolly, "to inform me, from your calm eminence of respectability, that I was no fit companion for such a young and innocent person, and to warn me that you were prepared to act as her protector."

Brant slightly inclined his head.

"I may have had something of that nature in my mind."

"Well, Lieut. Brant," and the older man rose to his feet, his eyes still smiling, "some might be impolite enough to say that it was the conception of a cad, but whatever it was, the tables have unexpectedly turned. Without further reference to my own personal interests in the young lady, which are, however, considerable, there remain other weighty reasons that I am not at liberty to discuss, which make it simply impossible for you to sustain any relationship to Miss Gillis other than that of ordinary social friendship."

"You—you claim the right—"

"I distinctly claim the right, for the reason that I possess the right, and no one has ever yet known me to relinquish a hold once fairly gained. Lieut. Brant, if I am any judge of faces, you are a fighting man by nature as well as profession, but there is no opportunity for your doing any fighting here. This matter is irrevocably settled—Naida Gillis is not for you."

Brant was breathing hard. "Do you mean to insinuate that there is an understanding, an engagement between you?" he faltered, scarcely knowing how best to resent such utterance.

"You may place your own construction upon what I have said," was the quiet answer. "The special relations existing between Miss Gillis and myself chance to be no business of yours. However, I will consent to say this—I do enjoy a relationship to her that gives me complete authority to say what I have said to you. I regret having been obliged by your persistence to speak with such plainness, but this konwledge should prove sufficient to control the actions of a gentleman."

For a moment the soldier did not answer, his emotions far too strong to permit of calm utterance, his lips tightly shut. He felt utterly defeated. "Your language is sufficiently explicit," he acknowledged at last. "I ask pardon for my unwarranted intrusion."

"Naida Gillis Is Not for You."

At the door he paused and glanced back toward that motionless figure yet standing with one hand grasping the back of the chair.

"Before I go, permit me to ask a single question," he said, frankly. "I was a friend of old Ben Gillis, and he was a friend of my father before me. Have you any reason to suspect that he was not Naida Gillis' father?"

Hampton took one hasty step forward. "What do you mean?" he exclaimed fiercely, his eyes two coals of fire.

Brant felt that the other's display of irritation gave him an unexpected advantage.

"Nothing that need awaken anger, I am sure. Something caused me to harbor the suspicion, and I naturally supposed you would know about it. Indeed, I wondered if some such knowledge might not account for your very deep interest in keeping her so entirely to yourself."

SYNOPSIS.

To the Republican Voters of Garrett County.

A. C STURGISS, CHAIRMAN — A. F. GEORGE — HARVEY J. SPEICHER

Garrett County Republican Committee

Oakland, Md., October 26, 1907.

Dear Sir:

Never in the history of our State have we had a more important election than the one to be held on November 5th.

The right of every voter is of paramount importance. The Democratic party is seeking to perpetuate its power by a trick ballot which has already disfranchised 50,000 of our voters, many of whom are our heaviest taxpayers and best citizens. We desire to call your attention to the fact that while there were last year 4149 registered voters, 24 of whom are colored, in Garrett county, one-half of that number of voters either stayed at home or their ballots were not counted.

The battle is on and it behooves every Republican to do his utmost to get out the full Republican vote.

We know that you are a man of influence in your community and we ask you to see as many Republican voters of your district as you can, and especially those who did not vote last year, and urge them to go to the polls and vote the straight Republican ticket.

Personal effort means much and you can do a great deal to help redeem Maryland and win a victory for a free ballot and a fair count; one vote for every man, and to have that vote counted as cast. You can by YOUR PERSONAL effort do much to bring about a glorious victory and give our entire ticket a rousing majority.

Yours for victory all along the line,

A. C. Sturgiss

Chairman Republican County Committee.

RULE SAVORS OF OLIGARCHY.

Democrats Have Too Long Been in Power in Maryland.

Cumberland, Md., Oct. 7, 1907.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

The Democratic party has had full control of the political affairs of Maryland for 40 years, with the exception of four years, when Hon. Lloyd Lowndes was governor. Not in the history of our state since its birth in the memorable year of 1776 has there been such a prolonged reign of party power—almost a dynasty in its character. Such rule is not for the real interests of the whole people, but mostly for the few in power. It is neither Democratic, Republican nor even Americian in political effect. The masses of the people want a change, and an improvement in our state government and in general affairs. And now is the acceptable time to secure it, by the election of the Republican state ticket, of excellent men, for Governor, George R. Gaither; Comptroller, James H. Baker; Attorney General, Hammond Urner, and Clerk of the Court of Appeals, Thomas Parran. This ticket needs no eulogy, and is worthy of the support not only of the Republican party but many not within its lines—of independent, and individual views, of whom there are now many. The ticket is a fit and suitable one, worthy of general support. These reasons of themselves ought to be sufficient for the Democratic party, but there are many others of a more positive nature, some of which will be placed in view of voters in this paper.

But the vital issue of our next election will be the ballot and registration questions. They will be paramount to all others. The ballot is the very foundation of our governmental system. The will and wants of the people are made known by ballots of voters. That our whole election system is in a most deplorable and oppressive condition, none can deny, unless it be the few who are the beneficiaries thereof. And let it not be overlooked that the Democratic party is the author of these wrongs and hardships now borne by our people, the result of their persistent legislation from time to time, to disfranchise or prevent persons from voting who might not support that party. Party domination has been given for the convenience or engagement to persons who have the constitutional qualifications to vote.

True there should be restrictions or restraints upon the ballot, but they should be reasonable, just and in accordance with the constitution, and not purposely prohibitory. Our election law should be plain and intelligible, so that the uneducated may understand or be made to understand. But as they now exist, even intelligent persons are in doubt. Elections ought to be such as to draw voters to the polls, not to prevent them from coming. Many voters now dread or so much dislike the election system, as to prevent them from attending. It is an ordeal they do not wish to encounter. Democratic legislation on the registration and ballot questions show forcibly that the purpose was to exclude voters who would not be with and for that party. Of course these prohibitions were covertly aimed at the colored people, but the fact is, as is now well known, that more white voters have been harmed than colored ones.

The Poe amendment, as is well known, was a Democratic measure, through not favored by Gov. Warfield. The object of it was to give the disfranchising business a constitutional foundation, so as not to be interfered with by any anterior authorities. It is placed the power to enfranchise, or disfranchise voters in the hands of the registration office. Under it they could have refused registration to a majority of persons fit to be registered, by asking them a few difficult constitutional questions, which they would not be able to answer. But fortunately for us the odious amendment was voted down by the people, regardless of party feelings, and the honor of our state saved, at least to that extent.

And now let it be shown how and in what manner our registration and ballot system affect the voters and election results in our good old state. According to official records there are in the state 225,689 registered white voters and 52,301 colored votes—277,890 in all. At our last election in 1906 there were cast only 191,632 voters. The stay-home and uncounted voters were 82,258; and further, that from 25,000 to 30,000 were thrown out or uncounted on account of defects in the ballot in not coming up to the requirements of our intricate laws. No wonder we hear so much about "trick ballots"—much ground for the talk. In Allegany county there are 12,985 registered voters, but at the election of 1906 only 5,906 ballots were counted. Garrett county has 4,149 registered voters, but only 1,971 ballots counted at the last election. This is the way the system works.

From Democratic sources we are hearing much about negro domination as a mere whim. I know of a more suitable name for it. There is not a colored man holding office in our county or the state, at least of any importance, although they have over 52,000 registered voters in the state, almost one-fifth of the whole. It is an obvious fact, that colored people as a class are not clamoring for or hunting office, in the manner the white men are doing it. Let this fact stand to their credit; and may they remain in that suitable relation. But might not the white folks modify their zeal for office, somewhat at least. Another view of this domination question: Under our national constitution, the colored race counted much as the white in forming a basis for congressional representative. The colored population in our country number about 8,000,000. The congressional basis is about 200,000 for a representative; so that population elects 40 members to the lower House of Congress and nearly all that basis elects Democratic congressmen. So really this vast colored population helps the Democracy in their domination. Were these 8,000,000 people without civil existence, there would be about 40 congressman less, and most domination would fall upon the Democratic party. Surely the party can see this.

This paper comes from a Republican voter, old as the party itself; an unfailing adherent to its principals and creeds, because they were and now are, national, patriotic, just and for the good of all, and in strict accordance with our national constitution and adverse to sectionalism, localism and prejudices of all kinds. This is not only a union of states, but also a nation; a leading member of the great internationality.

In preparing this paper I have carefully avoided the use of epithets or harsh expressions of any kind towards our political opponents, not forgetting they are fellow citizens, and entitled to respectful treatment. It is however true, the wrongs and errors complained of are of their enactments or actions. But let we Republicans have the power, and we will cure them willingly for all the people of our good old state. No doubt when the Republican party is given the necessary power, and have cured the existing evils and hardships, Democrats as well as Republicans, will feel as they should, grateful for the general relief and cure of unbearable evils and hardships.

Of course these remarks are to be in the interest of the county ticket just announced, in like manner as the state ticket.

Committee.

O, NO! It's nothing to dabble in politics while on the bench; it's nothing to be the chief actor in a fraudulent primary; it's nothing to lobby against the interests of your own community and in the interest of a corporation. What are all these things in comparison with keeping the Democratic orgarization in the saddle? That's one of the things we are on earth for.

WILL somebody explain how in the world it happened that such a splendid man as Crothers is now alleged to be was twice repudiated by his own county—where they ought to know him best and where there is a Democratic majority? If the Judge isn't good enough for Cecil county, is he good enough for the rest of the State?

NO CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Only by voting against a constitutional convention will the voter do his full duty, even if, as he should, he votes solidity for the Republican ticket. The two things go together. The present Constitution has worked well for forty years. There is no need for it to be set aside. The highest political function of the people should not be lightly invoked. The question has to be voted upon at this time, according to the constitutional requirement that it shall be submitted to the people every twenty years; nevertheless, its submission is simply in the line of law. Let not the voter infer by the presence of the question upon the ballot that it is submitted in perforce of intelligent demand for constitutional changes at the present time. This is not the case.

Although the Republican ticket is all probability will be elected, the contingency of Democratic success would place in the hands of that party great power were the convention proposition by any chance to be adopted, for that party could be depended upon to employ the convention for the purpose of fortifying itself. The simple counsel that the voter needs to heed is that the best sentiment of the state is ranged against opening up the question of alteration of the Constitution at the present time. Therefore, let him be sure to vote upon this proposition, and vote against it.

GROTHERS STILL STATIONARY.

In his attempt to let the people know where he now stands on the issues of the campaign Mr. Crothers has been highly successful. He is still stationary. He has not budged an inch since the formulation of his policies in his speech of acceptance. He might just as well have reissued that wordy and dusty document with the superscription "as ever, yours truly." But the declaration of the Democratic nominee is not a matter for levity. It shows such a deplorable inability to adjust himself to the point of view of the public, after weeks of an enlightening campaign, that more than anything else it proves conclusively the futility of counting upon the Democratic regulars to moderate in any particular their announced position. Everyone by this time knows that the reform of the election laws is the prime issue of the campaign. Everyone knows of the iniquities of the extra session and Wilson bill. Everyone knows that they are a pair of partisan ticket measures that are a disgrace to the state. Everyone knows that the set determination of the people to wipe them from the statute books has been intensified, as they saw the Democratic losses in the counties under the Wilson bill.

Yet, despite the accumulation of evidence to the contrary, the Democratic candidate has the temerity to chirp the praise of the existing law. He has no word of reprobation for the Wilson Law in general or for the fraud and chicanery to which it is being put in many of the counties. He has no word of advocacy for a uniform ballot law for the state, such as Maryland had before the professional tamperers renewed their tinkering with the election machinery. What he does say is that, should his party win in the coming election, he pledges himself to moderate the present law in the direction of having the intent of the voter better respected. But how is this to be done? The Republicans have specifically outlined their procedure. Why has not the Democratic candidate a definite plan to propose? The reason is clear enough. All that Mr. Crothers means is that the Democratic party still asserts its right to tamper further with the machinery of elections in the interest of the Democratic party. Only this and nothing more. Read aright, his words give grounds for the inference that the Democrats, who have debased the election laws, will be permitted to perpetrate further atrocities in the same spirit and with the same intent. The people want no more Democratic election law-making. Even if the party had a specific form of relief to propose it would be viewed with suspicion. But it has not. It only promises that it will endeavor to reclaim as many as possible of the Democratic ballots that have been lost through overzeal of the bosses to count the Republicans out.

Of a similar order is the reference made to the disfranchisement proposal. The candidate asserts the purpose of his party to prepare a constitutional amendment that will operate against the colored voter and yet protect the illiterate white voter. This is exactly what was declared when the Poe Amendment was before the people. Had it been adopted it would have deprived thousands of naturalized voters of their ballot. The same set of tinkerers would work upon the new amendment with the same result. But, as a matter of fact, constant talk about the colored voter is only a pretext. The intention of the Democratic Bourbons in the future, as in the past, is to so manipulate the ballot laws so that those voting against them shall be deprived of the ballot. To this end the enactment of another disfranchising amendment would be proposed

If this declaration is all that Mr. Crothers would have contributed to the platform discussion, it is well for his party that he was not in a position to recite his platitudes before the people of the state, who are up in arms against the very things for which Mr. Crothers stands.

WILL RESERVE PEOPLE'S RIGHTS.

There is nothing more exasperating than to go to the polls to cast one's ballot and be confronted by a Chinese puzzle. A man may not be a particularly good citizen in the abstract, but if he exercises his right to vote, he feels a pride in the performance, and he approaches the polling booth with something of exultation in his bearing and in his heart. It occurs to him that he is doing a proper thing, a patriotic thing—something that may benefit himself as well as the community, and when he finds that he has to achieve his purpose through an entanglement of difficulties which rarely present themselves under any other conditions, his exultation collapses with the swiftness of a punctured balloon.

This happens on every election day in the state of Maryland. Thousands of citizens, among them many of the best educated, have lost their votes by this preposterous ballot law. In some counties the situation is worse, because of the tricks which are either permitted under the law or winked at by the officials. The law was enacted by the Democratic party for the express purpose of excluding from the ballot-box citizehs who would vote the Republican ticket. It is no use to assert the contrary, because both the action and the object of the party were made known, not only by the press, but by the party itself, and a special session of the legislature was called for that purpose. Under the leadership of John Walter Smith, the sponsor for Mr. Crothers, the Democratic candidate for governor, this session was called and these laws were passed.

Ordinarily, a party can find some loophole for escape from an embarrassing situation, but the Democrats cannot even put up the semblance of a plea for their action in this case, except the bald fact that they wished to disfranchise a number of their fellow-citizens who voted the Republican ticket. In other words, they wanted to make their majority so big that the party would be safe under all conditions, no matter what it did or what it left undone.

This is the situation today in Maryland. It is this which the Republicans propose to change. They propose to make it possible for every citizen to cast his ballot, no matter whom he intends to vote for, and have it counted as he directs. Voting under Democratic administration of the ballot-box has actually become a nuisance. In order to exclude a few votes here or a few votes there they have adopted a system which frequently discourages their own supporters, but they seem to think that the exclusion of a certain number of Republicans is full compensation for all the losses they may sustain in their own ranks. It is the old story of the peacock with his gorgeous tail in the air, while his ugly clumsy feet are patent to all who behold him. It is impossible to believe that the intelligent citizens of this state are willing longer to submit to such disreputable political tactics. The people are not children. They are entitled to certain elementary rights, and it is these rights which the Republican party proposes to restore to them.

WHY should any man, claiming to be a Republican, scratch his ticket at this election? What good reason can he give that will satisfy his own conscience? In this matter of voting there is a principle behind it all. If the ticket your party has nominated meets all your requirements as to efficiency and honesty in its respective candidates, then it is your duty as a loyal Republican to support that ticket.

CONGRESSMAN WACHTER in his speech to over two thousand Republicans at the New Bohemia Hall in Baltimore Thursday night, put the whole situation, as regards the Republican party in Maryland in this campaign, in a nutshell, when he said: "You have heard about the issues of the campaign, and it is needless for me to dwell at length upon them. Every Republican knows in this fight we are a unit, each man standing shoulder to shoulder, awaiting the coming of the 5th of November, when we shall march against the Democratic columns and pull them from their high places. The great responsibility of looking after the interests of this great state devolves upon us, and if we do not accept the responsibility we should get out of the business as a party altogether. In a campaign like this the candidates lose their identity. You do not vote for a candidate, but what he represents—what he stands for. No man can say that the issues of this campaign do not concern him. It comes close to our homes—to our firesides. We know the character of the men who are prosecuting the fight on the Democratic side. You can judge the future by the past. What John Walter Smith did once he may be relied upon to do now. What George R. Gaither accomplished for good government in the past he may be trusted by the help of the Republican legilature to accomplish again."

A LAST WORD.

The ticket nominated by the Republican party by the County Convention compares as a whole very favorably with the ticket placed in the field by the opposition, and in some respects it is very superior, so why not support the ticket in its entirety?

The election occurs on Tuesday of next week. Go to the polls and cast your ballot for the entire State and county ticket as nominated by the Republican party.

Will Inspect B. & O. System.

President Oscar G. Murray, of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, returned to Baltimore, after spending three months in Europe, and is expected to begin his regular fall inspectipn of that system within the next few weeks. President Murray held a conference yesterday with executive officials and heads of departments and plan for the general inspection will likely be announced early next week. President Murray announces that the Baltimore & Ohio is more prosperous at the present time than ever before and that the freight tonnage is increasing.

A LETTER TO THE VOTERS OF GARRETT COUNTY.

BY J. B. EMORY.

To the Editor of The Republican:

We, as children of a great nation, as subjects of a noble commonwealth, and as liberty-loving citizens of Garrett county, standing as we do before the open door of a state and county campaign ought to wipe the fog of prejudice from the windows of our understanding that we may clearly discern the real issue at stake in the present conflict between the great political parties and accurately measure the jeopardy in which our individual liberty and personal dignity is placed.

It does not require a very profound analysis of the legislative records of the past six years to discover the trend of the Democratic policy in this good state of Maryland and to reach the inevitable conclusion that the paramount issue in this campaign is Election Reform. The well informed know of a certainty that the gentlemen who seek election under the banner of Democracy at the approaching election are pledged heart and hand to the securing of legislation on the subject of elections, which virtually means a perpetuation of the present mischief-working law, with untold new and mystifying complications, to confuse and debar the honest voter and the establishment of the despicable Poe Amendment.

The falling off of nearly one-fifth of the votes in the yaers since the passage of the present Democratic election law furnishes unmistakable evidence of the danger to be apprehended from entrusting such a vital matter to men who are pledged to a policy so unfair and un-American. The records and experience of the past have shown this law to be practically a disfranchisement law, not only to the negro, but to many thousands of our worthy white citizens, our fathers bowed beneath the weight of years whose best years were given to the defence of our country's honor, whose hands have labored diligently in the construction of our homes, our state and our liberty, and whose trembling hand can no longer trace a score of democratic X's in as many democratic squares on a Democratic puzzle ballot, has been robbed of his highest civil right and his God-given right of suffrage.

Put this question to yourselves fairly, young men. Will you suffer the gray hairs of your fathers to be thus insulted? Will you lend your hand to the casting of a ballot in support of a policy that hurls a pretended blow at the negro dodger and slaps your father and yourself in the face with the filthy hand of political intrigue?

The democratic candidates in this county do not very clearly define their platform, because they think it wiser to hide in the mist of uncertainty, and while they speak glibly their purpose to secure the enactment of a primary election law for Garrett county, we are left in uncertainty as to the nature of the law they would make for us, and we can natuarlly conclude that it would be patterned after their own idea of fairness as set forth in all Democratic election schemes.

Think fairly of the hardships to which the voters are subjected under existing election arrangement—the trip to the county seat over rough roads to swear that you mean to become a citizen and a voter—think of these specifications of an American citizen and stand at the door of civilized justice and with the invincible might of your ballot strike a shoulder blow in defence of law and good government.

The Republican administration in Maryland gave to her citizens, when in control a few years ago, a fair and open election law whereby every citizen could vote his sentiments in behalf of whatever principal he advocated and his expressed intention shown by his ballot was accepted and he had not the mortification of seeing his ballot thrown out on account of a line drawn beyond a certain specified limit.

This question is the real living issue in the present campaign, and as the Republican party in the state and county is pledged to secure the enactment of a fair and simple election law, if elected, we can gather hope from the precedents they have set and hail with great joy the day when we can select our ticket and mark our sentiment upon a sensible ballot by a single mark and feel sure that it will be accepted as the voice of a man and an American citizen.

Then let every voter in Garrett county pull his head out of the trap wherein he has fallen and stand high up on the hill of justice and virtue and when he speaks on the fifth day of November his enemies will hear his voice and will flee away and a Republican state and county administration will add to him and his house all the blessings of domestic peace, prosperity and a larger measure of civil liberty.

THE ELECTION LAW.

Old Men Who Have Helped Develop The County Suffer By It.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

I read with very great interest the two communications in THE REPUBLICAN last week from "Voter" and "Veteran," for in my opinion too much cannot be said in condemnation of the present iniquitous ballot law, passed by the Democrats in extraordinary session, which has disfranchised hundreds of our very best citizens.

Among those who suffer most by this infamous law are the men who have grown old and gray, their eyes are dimmed, their hands tremble now, they have been heavy tax payers for many years, yet now on account of their feebled condition, are deprived of the dearest right of American citizenship.

They tell us they want to "purify the ballot by eliminating the illiterate negro vote." Heavens, what saints those Democratic orators would have us believe they are, and at the same time they are ready to practice any old trick, any old fraud, all kinds of dishonesty, in order to secure the positions and emolients of office.

Now is the time for the voters to arise and teach the Democrats a lesson of good common sense, that the people don't propose to pay their money to keep rotten politicians in office without having a say as to who shall manage the affairs of state; that the cardinal principal of our Government is "no taxation without representation."

Bittinger, Oct. 28, 1807 G. W.

Letter to G. D. White.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: Here's a tale with a point to it. Florida is the hardest state in the Union for paint.

Gilmore & Davis Co, Tallahassee, Florida, think they know what paint can do in their climate; they've been painting for 35 years, Devoe ten years; and they say Devoe wears 10 years—their words are: "Buildings we painted Devoe 10 years ago are in a good condition of paint today."

They also says lead-and-oil wears only one year there; Devoe 10 years!

Ten years is a long lifetime for paint in Florida; longer than 20 in Maine. We don't dare say that either is true as a general fact in those States; but there are such instances.

If we should call the cost of Devoe in Florida half of the usual cost of paint, it would be too much; we suppose it's about one-third; there is so much trash there—the costliest paint is the worst, and the worst is the costliest everywhere.

38 F W DEVOE & CO

BLUNDERS IN THE OFFICIAL BALLOT.

Errors, Which If Not Corrected, May Invalidate Election.

The official ballots, the printing of which was awarded by the majority members of the Board of Supervisors, to the Garrett Journal, which in turn "farmed" the contract to a printing firm in Frederick City, arrived here last night by express and this morning upon being inspected by Mr. E. E. Sollars, Republican member of the Board, two errors in the names of Republican candidates E. E. Friend and James A. Sincell were discovered. Mr. Friend's Christian name was certified to the Board as Edwin E. Friend, and on the ballots it appears as Edward E. Friend. In the name of Mr. Sincell the Christian name James appears spelled Jamls.

These errors, if not corrected by the board, may invalidate the election on next Tuesday, as the law expressly says that when an error in the printing of the ballot is discovered it shall at once be corrected.

In addition to the above the arrangement of the ballot was changed from that decided upon and ordered by the Board, the positions of the candidates for Attorney General and Comptroller and those of the Sheriff and State's Attorney being transposed.

The many friends of the Rev. Geo. C. Shaw, who lately resigned the Rectorship of St. Matthew's Parish to accept a charge in South Cumberland, will be grateful to learn that he is less dangerously ill than he was at time of our last issue, but he continues to be ill with typhoid fever in a Cumberland hospital. Mr. Shaw's condition was rendered alarmingly acute by the shock of his wife's death last Thursday. Mrs. Shaw was not in good health and complications of a rapid growth involving the functions of the heart hastened the end. Her funeral services were from Emmanuel Episcopal church of Cumberland and they were attended by Rev. J. B. Workman and Mrs. Workman, Dr. Robinson and several ladies, with choice flowers, from Oakland, and C. M. Miller and Mrs. Miller, of Swanton.

IMPORTANCE OF THE ELECTION.

"Voter" Calls Upon Every Citizen to Vote Next Tuesday.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

DEAR SIR:—The importance of the election to be held next Tuesday, Nov. 5th, cannot be overestimated, and you have done nobly to enlighten your readers.

A vote for George R. Gaither and the Republican candidates for the Legislature, counts toward the repeal of our unfair election laws, and the adoption of a simple ballot that any man can mark, and which will be counted as shown to be the intent of the voter, while a vote for the Democratic candidates means still further complication of our election laws which as they stand, virtually disfranchise one-quarterof our voting population.

All will remember the fight against the Foe Amendmeut two years ago. The Democratic platform for this year again declares that—

"The Democratic party stands steadfast in its determination to eliminate the illiterate voter, and to this end we will at the earliest possible time submit a constitutional amendment which"—will accomplish this end.

If this can be done by the party now in power, it will mean the disfranchisment of some of the best and most substantial citizens of Garrett county.

The Legislative candidates on the Democratic ticket in our county stand upon the platform of their party, which on the great question of suffrage, is against the interest of Garrett.

Our late Republican representatives at Annapolis did what they could to improve the condition of our election laws. A bill was introduced to repeal the obnoxious requirement of an affidavit before the clerk of the court a year in advance of the intention of citizenship, but it failed of passage.

They were able, however, to repeal the Wilson ballot law for our county, which will be a great relief in the coming election, for this year we will have the party designation, or word Republican, to the right of the name of every one of our candidates, so that they can be easily distiuguished. For this they deserve the thanks of every voter irrespective of party.

It is the duty of every one to vote. Let us hope that there will be no stay-at-homes this year, but that the voice of Garrett will be heard in no uncertain tones crying for an honest ballot that will be counted as cast.

A VOTER.

Mrs. E. T. Fleming, with her son, Everett George, and her interesting twins, left Deer Park on Tuesday for Oakland, California, their home. From Deer Park they went to Cumberland and took B. & O. train No. 5 for Chicago. From Chicago to Omaha they travelled by the Chicago Great Western; from Omaha to Green River, Colorado, by the Union Pacific; from that point to Sparks, Nevada, by the Oregon Short Line, and from Sparks to San Francisco by the Southern Pacific. Mrs. Fleming came to Deer Park last May, and spent the entire summer at Deer Park. One of the twins was quite sick just after arrival. Dr. Cole of Deer Park, and Dr. McComas of Oakland, were in attendance and rendered medical aid. The child suffered from bronchial pneumonia and has a severe attack. Mr. Fleming is connected with the Chicago Great Western, the road that has made a close study of speedy freight shipment across the continent. ILLNESS DELAYED HIS HOME COMING.

Judge Robert R. Henderson Contracted a Severe Cold in London, England.

Judge M. L. Keedy of the circuit court yesterday received a letter from Judge Robert R. Henderson, who with Mrs. Henderson has been spendiug the past six weeks in Europe, acquainting Judge Keedy with the regrettable fact that his associate on the bench was ill in London, and his arrival home would in consequence be delayed. The missive which was posted on October 15th stated that Judge Henderson had been sick in bed for a week with a severe cold and symptoms of pneumonia, the presence of a physician twice daily being necessary.

Judge and Mrs. Henderson had expected to sail for home on October 16th and in that event would have reached home yesterday.

Acting upon the advice of the physician in attendance, it was determined to postpone sailing at least a week, that period to be devoted to complete rest in the hope of hastening convalescence. This arrangement if carriad into effect, and with no untoward complications would witness the landing of Judge and Mrs. Henderson in New York about the middle of next week.

FIKE.

Mr. Francis Fike, who moved here a short time ago had his foot mashed and is now in the hospital at Connellsville, Pa. His father was to see him and reports that his son is improving.

Wm. L. Fike was visiting friends and relatives in Uniontown, Pa., last week.

On last Saturday the people from all parts was seen passing through here on their way to the love feast at Markleysburg, Pa.

It is said the mail carrier from Somerfield, Pa., to Brandonville, W. Va., was taking a passenger with him one day last week and was to much infatuated talking to his lady friend that he lost the mail bag and all the mail but did not discover it was gone till he reached Glade Farms, W. Va. The mail bag has not yet been found and we can not say what the result will be.

Mr. James Thomas and two little sons was out here from White Rock visiting his daughter, Mrs. Wm. L. Thomas, on last Saturday and Sunday.

Bought Meat Market.

Mr. Herman Creutzburg, who recently returned to Oakland from the West, bought the meat market of W. D. Dixon located in the Mitchell building yesterday morning and will assume charge tomorrow. Mr. Creutzburg's friends in Oakland will be pleased to learn that he is again engaging in business here.

Took Judge Kendall's Roll.

Some three weeks ago Judge U. S. Kendall, who is now located at Oakland, Md., came over here and accompanied his niece, Miss Grace Kendall, to Boston, where she entered the Boston Conservatory of Music as a student. On his way home, either in New York or on his way from Boston to that city, the Judge was relieved of his pocket book, mileage book and other valuables, and he was left stranded in the great metropolis. As the vulger expression goes, he was obliged to make a "touch" from his business acquaintances to get home. It appears that the average picspocket is no respecter of persons.—Meyersdale Republican.

To the People of Garrett County:

A. G. STURGISS, CHAIRMAN — A. F. GEORGE — HARVEY J. SPEICHER

Garrett County Republican Committee

Oakland, Md., October 26, 1907.

MY DEAR SIR:

The glorious banner of Republican principles has been placed in the hands of GEORGE R. GAITHER, our candidate for Governor, who, holding it aloft, has placed himself in the front rank and calls upon the Republican forces in battle array to follow him to victory for civil liberty. He has been nominated upon a platform that pledges himself and party for the repeal of the present obnoxious election law.

This law was placed upon the statute books by the Democratic party in extra session, at a cost to the tax payers of the State of more than $100,000, and if you are a taxpayer you paid your share of the bill. All who have endeavored to vote this ticket know how unfair it is to the voter, requiring him to make a cross within the square after the name of every candidate for whom he wishes to vote, and if the lines of the cross mark extend over the square, or one candidate too many is voted for, or if the ballot is not properly folded, or soiled by finger marks, or any other mark set forth in what is commonly called the "Trick Ballot Law," your ticket will not be counted. By this method and scheme of the Democratic party more than 50,000 votes cast at every election in the State of Maryland are thrown out, and many of those are votes of our best citizens and heaviest taxpayers.

The candidates on the Republican State ticket and for the House of Delegates are pledged by their platform, if elected, to repeal this unjust law, as well as that part of the registration law which requires a voter who comes into our State to go to the court house, whether living a distance of 1 or 40 miles therefrom, and make affidavit a year in advance that he desires to become a citizen before he is allowed to register and vote. This is a hardship imposed by the Democratic party upon all classes of our voters, and especially upon the poor who cannot afford this loss of time and expense. This they cannot deny, and every vote cast for the Democratic ticket is a vote in favor of the continuance of this law, the repeal of which is the paramount issue in this campaign.

The Democratic candidates for the House of Delegates in this county, are, by their party platform, pledged to stand by, protect, uphold and vote to maintain this law. Hundreds of good citizens now living in our county, many of whom have bought farms, on account of this unfair ballot law are not enjoying the birthright conferred upon them by the Constitution.

The Democratic party is pledged in its State platform to make the Poe Amendment a part of the State Constitution. This would require that you be able not only to read and write before you would be allowed to vote, but further, that you must explain to the satisfaction of the Democratic Registers any section of the Constitution of the State which they may require. So vote against the call for a Constitutional Convention.

The Democratic candidates will try to divert the issue by talking about other subjects. The candidates for the House of Delegates have already done this by publishing a platform of their own. They do not want to talk about the election law. They want you to forget it. They want to deceive the voter. Will you be deceived?

The Republican candidates for the House of Delegates pledge themselves to the passage of an election law which will allow the voter, by a single mark if he so desires, to cast his vote for all the candidates of the party of his choice and to have that vote counted as cast without being subject to the dangers of the present law.

We appeal to you as a Republican of influence to take off your coat and put forth every effort to have your friends and neighbors go with you early to the polls on the morning of Tuesday, November 5th, and vote the full Republican ticket. A vote for the Democratic candidates for the House of Delegates means a vote for the continuance of the present trick election law and all it stands for. It also means a vote for a Democratic candidate for United States Senator. This in turn means a vote for free trade and all its attendant evils.

By your votes you helped to defeat the Poe Amendment two years ago. We again appeal to you to help defeat this unfair and un-American election law by voting for GEORGE R. GAITHER and the Republican ticket from top to bottom, and thereby restore your rights as free American citizens to have your vote counted as cast, and reduce your taxes by depriving the Democrats of another opportunity for more extra sessions of the legislature in order to pass trick ballot laws at your expense.

Vote for the party of Lincoln, McKinley and Roosevelt, prosperity and progress. Don't forget the day, Tuesday, November 5th.

NUT GROWING IN MARYLAND.

An Industry That is Destined to Prove a Source of Some Revenue.

Prof. C. P. Close, State horticulturist, connected with the Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station at College Park, Prince George's county, has been collecting data in regard to nut growing in Maryland. He read a paper on the subject at the recent meeting of the National Nut-Growers' Association at the Jamestown Exposition. Professor Close obtained some facts showing that nut growing has been long established in Maryland.

On the Eastern Shore are a number of ancient pecan trees. One of them, said to have grown from a nut planted 107 years ago, is 100 feet high and as wide in spread of branches, and the trunk has a diameter of five feet. Two other large pecan trees, each 100 years old, are known, and there is another oldtimer 83 years old. Persian walnut trees are numerous, and there are a number of magnificent old specimens which grow 3 bushels of nuts annually. One tree, 50 years old, is said to have produced from three to ten bushels a year for the last 30 years. Nearly all the young trees are productive, seedlings beginning to bear at from five to ten years after planting.

The only nut nursery reported in the State is in Western Maryland, and contains about 1200 young trees. In that part of the State the native nut trees succeed well, and thousands of pounds of chestnuts are gathered and shipped annually. About 75 Persian walnut trees are reported from Washington county. One tree cleft grafted on black walnut produced 300 nuts the third year from grafting, and more than 1000 nuts the fourth year.

Professor Close summarizes the Maryland situation as follows:

"The native black walnut, butternut, hickory, chestnut, beech, hazel and chinquapin abound almost everywhere. A few of the black walnuts and hickories are of special merit and will be utilized as a basis of improving these nuts. Most of the State has produced excellent Persian walnuts and some pecans for more than a hundred years. Only a few named varieties of the improved sorts have thus far been tried. The improved varieties of chestnuts are not generally profitable, but may become so if the immense crop of native chestnuts is cut short by the disease which is now threatening it and which is causing the death of hundreds of trees from two to three feet in diameter. The Japan walnut is not grown and is not likely to be. But, in general, there is an awakening to the possibilities of nut culture, and in a few years Maryland will rank as a nut producing State. She has the requisite soil and climate, and since satisfactory varieties are to be had, it is now only a question of launching the industry systematically, and this movement has already begun."

In order to stimulate interest in nut planting, the Experiment Station last spring sent out 74 Persian walnut trees to 16 localities throughout the State. "We expect to send out several hundred more trees, and perhaps also establish several nut orchards in various parts of the State."

ANOTHER VETERAN SPEAKS.

Commends The Letter of His Comrade Which Appeared In This Paper Last Thursday.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

I have read with a great deal of interest, enlightenment and satisfaction the letters of my old Union comrade of the war of 1861 to 1865, a Veteran from District No. 2, in last week's issue of your paper. It is certainly a source of deep gratification, not alone to the old soldier, his sons and relatives, but to every patriotic citizen who favors fair elections, equity and justice to all, to read the appeal of our comrades to again stand shoulder to shoulder, line up on the side of fair elections, and vote for George R. Gaither and the whole Republican ticket, a vote that will mean liberty, purity and economy and place the seal of your condemnation upon the present election law, trick ballots and extravagance.

If my comrades will but recall the fact all legislation favorable to the Defenders has met opposition from the Democracy, even to the extent of admitting old soldiers to Government positions and protecting them in these positions. The letter of "Veteran" enthuses every loyal heart of those who reside along the line of the Appalachian where Washington, Lincoln and Grant found the men who saved the nation and upheld the Constitution, so in this case let old Garrett get into the fight and give an increased majority for the whole Republican ticket.

Let farmers, merchants and men of daily toil and all good citizens, irrespective of party affiliation, each make themselves a committee of one, a political missionary and go among friends, seeing them individually, and the result on November 5th will be the wresting from the grasp of the party of extra sessions and trick ballots every vestige of control and placing it in the hands of the Republican Party, who have pledged their candidates to the passage of such laws as will guarantee to all citizens the right and privilege of voting a fair ballot and having that counted as cast.

I again appeal to you comrades, your sons and neighbors, as I believe the old soldiers should be on guard when the liberty of man is at stake and on election he should vote as he shot, i. e.: for liberty, flag and country.

A Freight Wreck.

Early last Friday morning a freight wreck on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Rodamer, five miles west of Terra Alta, was the cause of all traffic being tied up for a number of hours. The cause of the wreck was a freight train running into a helping engine, with the result that both engines were badly damaged, as were some of the cars of the train.

WILL THEY NEVER LEARN?

One finds it difficult to explain just why the Democratic platform should contain a proposal to submit another disfranchising amendment at the earliest possible moment. It would seem that the voters of this State had most clearly and emphatically expressed their desire on this subject, when they rejected the former proposal by a majority of about 34,000. In view of this over-whelming vote, the author of the Poe Amendment advised against furthur agitation of this matter at this time. The Baltimore Sun also strongly urged, a few days prior to the Convention's assembling that the party should not commit itself in its platform to the submission of anothar Suffrage Amendment. And yet the Convention did so. The Bourbon element was in control and that Bourbon element never learns anything. They do not seem to realize that people are not like crabs—they do not go backwards. They do not seem to realize (to borrow the Sun's scathing characterization of the State Managers) that "we are living in a new political era in Maryland." They are determined to appeal to the most unscrupulous passions and the most unscrupulous element. They seem far more interested in maintaining their hold on the party machinery than in contributing to the party's honor and success. This can alone explain their action in the selection of a Gubernatorial candidate and in adopting another plank on the suffrage question. They cannot help knowing that such proceedings are highly offensive to all the better element of the party and that they are thereby jeopardizing the future of that party. It is a "rule or ruin" spirit that seems to animate them. In this campaign it is evidently "ruin." They are riding to a fall. The only hope for the real Democracy of Maryland is that the fall will be so severe and fatal as to forever destroy their power as party leaders, and relegate them to oblivion. The Democracy of Maryland needs a most unsparing "housecleaning," but it can only get it by the people declaring in trumpet tones that they will no longer tolerate the men who have usurped the fair name and dishonored the historic standing of the Democratic party. The rank and file of that party are not to be held responsible for these outrages on the voters rights. The outrages have come from the "machine politicians" of that party. These are the men who called the "extra session" to "doctor" the election law at a cost of about $100,000, to the tax-payers of the State; and these are the men whose schemes and leadership the people are about to rebuke with a whopping dose of defeat.

The true inwardness of Mr. Crothers' nomination is beginning to dawn upon the people of the State. They are awakening to the real significance of the fact that Mr. Crothers is not only a close personal and political friend of John Walter Smith, but that he was the Democratic "Leader" of the State Senate during Smith's "extra session," which so outrageously tampered with the ballot law. Mr. Crothers has been tried by the party leaders and found safe for their purposes. Their great objection to Mr. J. D. Baker was that he might have treated them as Governor Warfield treated them when he conscientiously refused to lend himself to the further emasculation of our election laws. The "Leaders" have never forgiven Governor Warfield for his refusal to do what they claim he was elected to do, and they are now hoping to elect a man who will not obstruct their nefarious attempts to perpetuate "one party rule" in Maryland by making elections a farce and the right to vote a mere nothing. In other words the Democratic "Managers" are determined to own Maryland, by fair means or foul. Governor Warfield was honest and sturdy enough to block their little game three years ago. Now they have selected a candidate to their own liking and are hoping to get a grip on the election machinery that will make their power unshakable. But the PEOPLE MUST BE RECKONED WITH!

Our forefahers consecrated this soil to the high doctrine of equal rights to all; not to the perpetual reign of a special class. We have been led to think that the true American doctrine is the trust of the people—not of a PART of the people; not of EDUCATED people, not of people who have had a fairer chance in life than others, but of ALL the people, rich and poor, educated and uneducated, high and low, without distinction of classes, conditions, nationality or complexion. The Bourbon element of Maryland's Democracy is preaching a doctrine that may belong to other lands but which certainly does not belong to this land. It tramples the Constitution underfoot, it denies the sacred inhertiance of a free people, it snatches the ballot from the hands of the poor and unlettered, and says "You may not participate in government here"—we will do your governing for you. No wonder the people have risen in indignant protest; no wonder they buried the iniquitous un-American Poe Amendment under a thirty thousand adverse majority; no wonder they refused to trust a party which cannot trust them. The Bourbon Democracy of Maryland has become a traitor to the people's rights, and deserves every defeat it gets at the hands of that outraged people. This is a government of the people, by the people and for the people. Democrats of the "extra-Session" stripe would make a government of politicians, by the politicians and for the politicians. And now it is to be seen who rules—THE PEOPLE OR THE POLITICIANS.

This it is which accounts for the deep, strong, intense enthusiasm which is moving the progress of Mr. Gaither and his running mates throughout the State. Something more than a party contest is involved. Popular rights are put in peril by the machinations of a political cabal, and popular indignation is naturally and righteously averred thereby. When the Democratic Convention had adjourned, it was generally recognized that that convention had by some mysterious juggling of the leaders, nominated an extremely weak and a hopelessly vulnerable candidate. But the character of the candidate has been well-nigh overshadowed by the critical quality of the supreme issue. When the returns are all in on November 5th, they will proclaim someting more than Mr. Crothers defeat; they will proclaim the people's stern guardianship of their civic rights

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day, Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. CROTHERS IN HIS OWN BAILIWICK

Charged With Being a Party to Crooked Primaries.

The Baltimore News of Wednesday devoted nearly seven columns on the last page to a recital of the many and varied political trickeries Judge Austin L. Crothers, the Democratic nominee for Governor, is alleged to have been playing in Cecil county, since he has been the accredited leader there. The article tells of the crooked primaries in Cecil county in 1903, when many more Democrats are alleged to have voted at the primary than were registered in Cecil county; how Crothers is said to have controlled the granting of liquor licenses, charging a fee for his services; how cases against liquor men were smothered in court; how Crothers is alleged to have been mixed in all kinds of bribery at elections. The News also charges Crothers with having mixed in politics since he has been upon the bench and that he favored the famous measure in the interest of the Octoraro Water and Power Company, a supposed subsidiary corporation of the Pennsylvania railroad, whereby all streams in the State could be condemned and the water used and diverted for any purpose by said company.

The last great fight between the Crothers and the anti-Crothers factions of the Democratic party was in 1903, when Republicans and minors and non-residents were voted by the Crothers people in open daylight, when the primaries in Elkton were held in Crothers' own office, when money flowed as it never had before in the county, and when the Crothers people had the "window." It is not necessary to produce confessions from the men who bought or sold votes on that occasion, because the figures of the election themselves, shows how there were more votes cast in that primary than there were Democrats in the county.

Here are the figures:

For the Crothers machine	1979
Against the Crothers machine	1380
Total	3359

At the election of the preceeding year, when the Democrats carried the county by a plurality of 146, the figures were as follows:

Democrats	2359
Republicans	2184
Total	4314

Here is a remarkable increase of more than 50 per cent, in the Democratic vote. On the basis of the primary vote, the Democratic majority in the county the year before, instead of the 146 actually obtained, should have been about 1129.

In Elkton, Mr. Crothers' own town, where his office was the polling place, the vote polled at the primary of 1903 was 843, while the Democratic vote polled at the preceding election was only 466, an astonishing increase of more than 80 per cent.

In the following election in Elkton, when Warfield carried Cecil county by a majority of 478, at which an extraodinary full vote was cast, the Democratic vote was only 634, or 213 less than cast at that primary.

Further, although it is known that a number of Democrats did not vote in that primary, although the normal Democratic majority in the county is not more than 200, and although there is a pretty good representation there of Probitionists and people who never vote in primaries, the total vote polled in the primary was more than half of the total registered vote of the conty—white and black, Republican, Prohibition and everything else combined.

There is only one explanation of these figures, and that is that frudulent votes were cast in that primary. And they could have been cast or counted only by the Crothers people, for they had the "window"—they named the election officials. Their opponents could not have committed the fraud, if they had wanted to.

In the securing of liquor licenes in Cecil county Mr. Crothers is alleged to have played quite an important role. Mr. Bayard wanted to get a liquor license in order to open a hotel at North East. He got signatures to his petition in due form and presented his application to the Liquor License Commissioners. Then he, too, was told that he would have to see Crothers.

"I went to see Mr. Crothere," said Mr. Bayard, "and his first question was 'How much money have you?'

"I told him I had enough money to pay the license charge.

" 'That won't touch it,' he said.

Akin to this is the matter of the domination of the Liquor License Board by Mr. Crothers when liquor was permitted to be sold in Cecil county. In support of the assertion that Mr. Crothers controlled the issue of liquor licenses, the News recited the case of Benjamin B. Price of Frederickstown, who had openly stated that Austin Crothers charged him $200 to get him his license.

Mr. H. P. Goldsborough, of Baltimore, of the liquor firm of Records & Goldsborough, also rushed into the arena to say that for the News that Price openly charged Mr. Crothers with getting a fee from him is the height of absurdity. Mr. Goldsborough's firm was very much mixed up with the granting of licenses in Cecil county, if common report there is correct, and he himself if correctly quoted in the Sun, he was fully aware of the proper man to whom to apply for a liquor license, for he says:

"I myself offered to Mr. Crothers $200 as a fee to obtain a license for Ira Wells at North East."

One more instance apropos of Mr. Crothers' connection with liquor cases. There is a man near Woodlawn, Cecil county, by the name of Thomas Krauss, who is commonly reported to keep a "speak-easy" there. At the present time the sale of liquor is prohibited in Cecil county. Some time ago the residents in the neighborhood of Krauss' place made a determined effort to have Krauss arrested and convicted of vfolating the liquor law, and a dozen witnesses went to Elkton to appear there before the grand jury against the man. The News correspondent saw two of these men—George Tyson, who lives directly opposite Krauss, and Edwin Barnes, Krauss' nearest neighbor on the same side of the road.

"I went before the grand jury and told of this case," said Mr. Tyson. "Krauss' place is the scene of constant riotings and disorder and it keeps up to this day. We have unmistakable evidence of the sale of liquor there. Men come there sober and go away drunk. They came out wild with liquor and their profanity can easily be heard at my house. I have known them to run up and down shrieking murder. The number of people who come there have no other business in the world, and everybody knows that they come to get drunk. Besides, I see wagonloads of the stuff being brought to Krauss' house. Then we had at Elkton men ready to testify that they had bought liquor there."

Mr. Barnes makes the same statement regarding the business done at the house. "However," he says, "although I went to Elkton for the purpose, they would not let me testify before the grand jury; and, although I wanted to employ a lawyer to present our ease, they would not let me.,'

The evidence against Krauss would certainly seem to have been sufficient to justify his indictment and trial. But the grand jury never found a bill against him.

The people of the neighborhood return one answer to this:

"Krauss got Austin Crothers to act as attorney for him and he kept the thing from ever getting out of the grand jury. Krauss afterward told people around here that Austin Crothers was a smart lawyer, but a dear one."

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. GEORGE C. SHAW.

Death is always sad, but the attendant sorrow is unusually distressing for Rev. George C. Shaw, pastor of Holy Cross Episcopal church. Rev Mr. Shaw is lying seriously ill with typhoid fever at Allegany hospital. His wife is dead at their home on Seymour street. Mrs. Shaw died yesterday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. The immediate cause of her death was heart failure. Mrs. Shaw had been a delicate woman for many months, but at times she was able to go out and within the past week she went to the hospital to see her husband. She had been confined to her room for the past few days. Rev. Shaw was attacked with typhoid fever in September, and about three weeks ago was taken to Allegany hospital. His condition has at times been very serious, but in the past few days he seemed to be out of danger. He is still a very weak man, however, so much so he could not prudently be apprised of the serious condition of his wife, and does not yet know that the Grim Reaper has visited his home. It was decided by his family and physician not to break the sad news to him last night, but to wait until this morning, when it is hoped after a night's rest he will be the better able to bear the shock.

Mrs. Shaw was about forty years of age and was a native of Wayne county, W. Va. She and Rev. Shaw were married about 21 years ago while Rev. Shaw was a pastor in the Wheeling diocese of the Episcopal church. They have been in Cumberland about six weeks, coming here from Oakland, Md., where Rev. Shaw had been pastor of St. Matthew's church. Besides her husband Mrs. Shaw is survived by two children, Mr. Harry W. Shaw, a student in a business college here, and Miss Loella Shaw, who is attending one of the city schools. The funeral arrangements have not yet been made, but the burial will probably take place on Saturday morning with interment in Rose Hill cemetery. Rev. C. E. Shaw, pastor of St. Thomas Episcopal church, Hancock, a brother of Rev. Shaw, of this city, arrived here yesterday afternoon. —Cumberland News, Friday.

ISRAEL M. FRANKHOUSER.

Israel M. Frankhouser was born Jan. 15, 1822, near Brandonville, on the farm now owned by Jonas Frankhouser, his brother. He was the son of Daniel Frankhouser, who moved from Lancaster, Pa., to Grant district, Preston county, W. Va., in the year 1800, being one of the first settlers of that community. In 1857 he was united in marriage to Elizabeth A. Gutherie, a daughter of Stephen Gutherie. Two years later he moved fron Brandonville to a farm in Garrett county, Md., near Cranesville, where he resided for 54 years and devoted his entire life to farming. To this union four children were born: Marshal H., who lives on the home farm; Belle, wife of E. G. Albright; Laura, wife of E. H. Wolfe, both of Cranesville, and Mrs. D. A. Albright, of Gainesville, Fla. Mr. Frankhouser died September 13, 1907, aged 85 years, 7 months and 28 days. He professed faith in Jesus Christ in the year 1865, and united with the Missionary Baptist church and lived a consistant christian life for more than forty years. The funeral services were conducted by the writer in the Lutheran church, assisted by Rev. Price of the M. E. church, in the presence of a very large congregation, which was evidence of the upright life and respect in which he was held by every one who knew him. His body was laid to rest in the Cranesville cemetery to await the resurrection of the just.

When the time shall reach it's sum
The King will surely come,
Though not to shed His blood;
But He will come with glory crowned
And then the Arch angel will sound
The awful trump of God!

The earth shall quake from pole to pole,
The heavens shall together fall,
And instantly expire;
The stars shall be from heaven hurled,
And even all this sin cursed world
Shall be one flaming fire!

But when the dreary graves shall burst,
The righteous dead shall all rise first
In Christs' own image bright;
And they shall in His throne sit down,
And each shall wear a robe and crown,
And praise Him day and night.

Then will all the glory give
To Him who dies that we might live
In His bright fair abode,
Where we shall reign in spotless white
And sweetly sing both day and night
The wondrous love of God.

YOUGH RIVER OIL AND GAS COMPANY

Forced to Suspend Operations on Account of Cable Parting.

WELL NOW DOWN 3530 FEET.

Work Will Be Resumed As Soon As New Cable Arrives, Which is Expected Within The Next Two Weeks—Indications Good For Oil.

At a depth of 3530 feet the cable used in boring the oil well by the Yough Oil and Gas Company on the Harned farm, five miles west of Oakland, parted on last Friday morning, more than 2000 feet of the steel rope coiling downward into the well, consequently stopping the sinking of the hole to a greater depth until a new and longer cable can be obtained from the manufacturers, which has already been ordered by the drilling contractors and is expected to arrive within the next two weeks, or probably less time.

At the moment the cable parted work was progressing very nicely and the drill had entered a sand which has been pronounced by experienced oil men to be one of the oil bearing formations.

The tools were recovered from the hole early Sunday morning, the cable being so badly twisted and damaged that it was entirely unfit for further use, hence the necessity of purchasing a new one, which will be five thousand feet long and which, as above stated, is expected here shortly.

Body Reinterred.

The remains of Mrs. Eliza M. Turney, wife of Daniel Turney, were buried in the Hoyes cemetery in December, 1905. On Oct. 19, 1907, the body was taken up and on the 20th was conveyed to Addison, Pa., and interred in the beautiful cemetery at that place, in the presence of quite a large company of relatives and friends.

Some Turney was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Willard Frazee, both of whom preceded her by a number of years to the immortal shore. Thomas Frazee and his invalid sister are the only remaining members of the family. Thomas, prompted by the tenderest feeling of love and affection, at great labor and expense, has gathered the sleeping dust of his parents and two sisters, Maggie and Emily, in the beautiful lot in the cemetery at Addison, and erected monuments over each.

Jonathan, the only brother, fell in the battle of Antietam, nobly and bravely defending the flag of his country and sleeps in the cemetery at that place. May they all have part in the first resurrection and enjoy peace and happiness forever. H. E. FRIEND.

SHORT RUN.

As I have not seen any news from our little village for a long time I will try and give you a few items.

We are having very nice weather at present. The farmers have all their work done and are fixing up their easy chairs for the winter.

Mr. Alex Wilson and William Moon, two of our hustlers, have been in Florida for about three weeks. They report every thing favorable.

Mr. Scott Harvey, who has been away with his threshing machine about eight weeks, will soon be home again.

Mr. Marvine Harvey has gone to Thayerville to visit his brother-in-law.

Miss Jeannette Wilson and Miss Grace Ault were visiting Judge Daniel Wilson last Sunday.

Mr. Chas. Miller was seen to pass through Sunday.

We are glad to say the Short Run grange is getting along very nicely.

Miss Emma Harvey was home Sunday.

Mr. Harry Hardesty was at Short Run Sunday.

Our school is progressing nicely under the management of Miss Merle Fowler. She certainly is blessed with good luck.

We don't know which one is going to draw the lucky number yet, Milo or Tom.

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God in his infinite wisdom and mercy to remove from her earthly labors and ministrations, by death, Mrs. Anna Shaw, wife of our beloved brother George C. Shaw, and

WHEREAS, Brother Shaw, during the last hours of his companion's earthly presence was ill and unable to be at the bedside of his loved one to comfort her and to point out the pearly kingdom beyond, and because of the irreparable loss sustained by him, therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the officers and members of Garrett Lodge Number 113, Knights of Pythias, of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, do hereby give expression of our sympathy for him and his family in their great trial and call upon the Supreme Ruler to strengthen him for the duties and life of the future and to restore him to those who are dependent upon him for advice and guidance; that we bear testimony to Mrs. Shaw's many virtues and stainless life and offer our condolence to him and his bereaved family over whom sorrow has hung her sable mantle, and pray that the Infinite Goodness may bring speedy relief to their burdened hearts and inspire them with the consolations that Hope in futurity and faith in God give even in the shadow of the tomb; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent Brother Shaw, that a copy be filed with the papers of the Lodge and that copies be sent to the county papers for publication.

All of which is respectfully submitted:

Garrett County Remains Loyal to the Republicans

Every Candidate Elected By Good Majorities, With Mr. Austin Brown, Sheriff, Leading. Gaither's Majority in the County 800.

STATE DEMOCRATIC BY 8,000.

The Supervisors of Elections for Garrett County, which is the canvassing board to go over and tabulate the returns, will meet at noon today and it will require several hours to go over the returns officially, but sufficient figures have been received unofficially to prove beyond a doubt that the entire Republican county ticket was elected by majorities ranging from 160 for Otho Fike, candidate for County Commissioner, to more than 750 for Austin Brown, candidate for Sheriff.

The county gives Mr. George R. Gaither, for Governor, nearly 800 majority.

The full official vote as recorded in the several districts will be published in this paper next Thursday.

Judge Austin L. Crothers (Democrat) of Cecil county will be the next Governer of Maryland. He was elected Tuesday over George R. Gaither (Republican) of Baltimore city by a plurality which was estimated late yesterday afternoon at approximately 8000.

In the city, Crothers' plurality over Gaither will be about 3900, while his running-mates on the State ticket get heavier majorities. With a few precints to hear from, the pluralities in the city will be about 7800 for Hering, about 6900 for Magruder and about 6000 for Straus.

Governor-elect Crothers will have as his assistants in the administration of the affairs of the State a full set of Democratic officials, every man on the State ticket with him having been elected.

In the next Legislation the Democrnts will have a big majority in both houses. The exact figures are not obtainable owing to the difficulties experienced both in the city and counties in tabulating the returns. Chairman Vandiver of the Democratic State Central Committee claims 85 members of the Senate and House of Delegates. Based on unofficials returns, Chairman Vandiver's claim does not seem to be exaggerated.

It was almost a clean sweep for the Democrats. They have elected members of the Legislature in such Republican strongholds as Calvert.

The returns from the city and counties show that former Governor John Walter Smith has won his fight for the Senatorship and that he will go into the Democratic caucus at Annapolis next January with more than enough votes to insure his nomination and subsequence election.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS.

Following in brief are the returns from Tuesday's election so far as can be adjudged at this time:

Massachusetts re-elected the entire Republican state ticket, headed by Governor Curtis Guild.

Pennsylvania elects John O. Sheatz, Republican, head of the ticket, for state treasurer by a large majority.

New York state elected Edwin T. Bartlett and Willard Bartlett, joint candidates on the Republican and Democratic tickets, for justices of the court of appeals, over the candidates of the Independence League, Hearst.

New York City elects the Tammany candidates by a considerable majority over the Independence League-Republican fusion candidates.

New Jersey evidently elects Republican governor and lesislature.

Rhode Island returns indicate the re-election of Governor James H. Higgens, Democrat, over Frederick H. Jackson, Republican, by a plurality estimated at about 1500.

The election of the Democratic ticket in Mississippi, headed by E. F. Noel, for governor is a foregone conclusion, as there was no opposition.

The Kentucky returns indicate a Republican victory, Willson winning the governorship by several thousand plurality.

In Nebraska M. B. Reese, Republican candidate for supreme court, the most important state office voted on, is probably elected.

The mayorality contest in Cleveland resulted in the election of Tom L. Johnson, present mayor, over Congressman Burton.

The American or anti-Mormon party at Salt Lake City is estimated to have the largest pluralities ever given in that city.

At Toledo Mayor Whitlock and the entire independent ticket is elected.

Cincinnati elects Col. Leopold Markbreit, Republican candidate for mayor.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK SUFFERS LOSS BY FIRE

New Association Building Used for Postoffice and Store Destroyed.

LOSS WILL AGGREGATE $8,000

Postmaster Rudisill Saved His Records By Having Them at His Home—Martin & King, Loose Heaviest—Building Insured for $2500.

Monday night the most destructive fire ever visiting Mountain Lake Park occurred when the new Association building erected last spring at a cost of more than $4000, was destroyed with all its contents, including the stock of merchandise owned by Messrs. Martin & King, general merchants, and the post office.

The fire was discovered shortly after midnight, indications pointing to the fact that it had its inception in the basement of the building, where less than a month ago a fire was discovered in a lot of litter but was put out before much damage was done to the building. At the time the fire was discovered Tuesday morning it had made such headway as to make it impossible to save the building and the energies of the people assembled were turned towards saving the merchandise of Messrs. Martin & King, but comparatively little was gotten out.

In the postoffice, which occupied a room adjoining the Martin store, Postmaster Rudisill had a stock of books, stationery, etc., store fixtures and the supplies of the office, but the people were afraid to force the door to this room on account of the Federal laws consequently Mr. Rudisill lost his entire stock of goods and the fixtures of the office, besides a large amount of mail matter, postal cards and stamped envelopes

Messrs. Martin & King state that their stock of goods was valued at $3000 upon which they had an inserance of $1500.

Mr. Rudisill carried no insurance and his loss is therefore a total one.

The Association had insurance amounting to $2500 in force, which was carried by Mr. John T. Mitchell.

LITTLE MAPLE SUGAR IS SOLO.

Imitations and Adulterations However Can be Had in Abundance.

Everybody knows where the young man's fancy is said to turn in the spring. But when it comes to a snappy morning in autumn it is hot cakes and maple syrup that makes his eyes shine. Love isn't in the same class then with waffles for breakfast.

This being the case, one is likely to think long, sad thoughts after perusing the latest statistrcs on the subject of maple sugar. What the pure food law will do to the maple sugar myths it is hard to tell, but the investigation carried on by the government has almost wiped maple sugar off the food map.

We have the Indians to thank for the art of making the real maple article. They used to do it in their own happy fashion, boiling down the sap by dropping relays of hot stones into it. The early settlers improved on this method, but their own manner of sugaring off remained pretty crude.

About 1850 the maple sugar business began to boom. Methods were improved. That made the product better, that sent up the demand, and by 1860 sap, demand, quality and price were all climbing.

The demand has been mounting ever since, but, strangely enough, in the face of this perpetual cry for maple syrup, there isn't much more than half as much made now as there was in 1850. The explanation is to be had in two words: The mixers.

Since 1850 the cost of producing cane sugar has gone down to a level compared with which the most of making maple sugar seems toplofty. During the same period glucose has made its bow and got into all kinds of sweet society.

The wholesale dealer takes the common cane sugar or glucose, puts into it from a sixth to a tenth as much real maple sugar and—we eat it on our cakes and waffles. According to the lowest estimate, seven-eighths of the product sold today is only partly maple sugar or is made entirely of other materials.

A maple flavor is said to be given to some of these imitation syrups by mixing with them an extract of hickory bark. An Indiana man even took out a patent on the use of such an extruct in making maple syrup.

In spite of the fact that the demand has increased enormously while the supply has remained about the same, the price of maple sugar and of the syrup has fallen from 13 cents a pound for sugar and $1.25 a gallon for syrup in 1882 to about 10 cents a pound for sugar and 90 cents a gallon for syrup at the present time.

The only way in which one can be reasuoably sure of getting the pure product is to deal directly with a trustworthy country producer. There are some of that kind. They can't afford to sell their product at the market rates for the cane-sugar-glucose hickory-bark article, but they have built up a market of their own.

There is made in this country about 12,000,000 pounds of maple sugar annually but a portion of this is sold in a coarse form to the mixers. Over 2,000,000 gallons of real syrup is manufactured annually.

Vermont used to lead in this production. Then New York took first place. Now the order runs Ohio, New York, Vermont, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Michigan and on down the list of 21 States sending in reports.

All maples have sweet sap, but only a few of the native species furnish sugar in paying quanties. The first place is held by the sugar maple and a variety of it, the black maple. It is a peculiar fact that the variety of the sugar maple which grows in the Gulf States does not yield sugar.

Maple sap is a nearly colorless liquid composed of water, sugar and various mineral substances, such as lime, potash, magnesia and iron. It also contains some organic matter in the form of vegetable acids. It is some one or a combination of all these substances in the sap which gives the sugar its flavor.

The amount of sugar in the sap varies greatly, the percentage changing as the season progresses. The maximum reported is 10.2 per cent. which was found in a small flow of sap from a tree near the end of a season. During the same season the same tree had averaged 5.01 per cent. The general average is about 3 per cent.

The sap season begins about the middle of March and continues until the third week in April. But it varies according to the lateness or timeliness of the spring.

Sugar making has begun as early as February 22 and as late as the first week in April. The season lasts on an average about four weeks. The longest run on record included 43 days; the shortest only eight days.

Although the phenomenon of sap flow is not yet perfectly understood it may be asserted that the popular idea of sap rising in the spring retreating to the roots of the tree in the autumn is a fallacy. Conclusive experiments have shown that on tapping the tree a flow of sap both from above and below comes toward the holes. There is always a very small flow from the sides of the top holes, the sap moving freely up and down the grain of the wood but very slowly and in small quantities across it.

An ordinary mature and thrifty maple will produce about 12 gallons of sap, or three pounds of sugar a season. A sugar grove has been known to average 19 gallons of sap to a tree during eight consecutive seasons, which included one poor year.

Some trees have been credited with enormous yields. For instance, a tree in Vermont is known to have produced 30¾ pounds of cake sugar in one season, its sap being so rich that seven quarts made one pound of sugar. Another maple in the same State gave 175 gallons of sap in one season.

MARGARET'S DISOBEDIENCE

By MARY A. DENISON

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

Mrs. Gen. Lansingham pushed her papers aside with an angry motion, so that one or two of them fell to the floor.

"No, it will never do!" she murmured, with an air of reflection. "I must make an example of her or she will presently be taking the reins in her own hands, and rule me."

Mrs. Gen. Lansingham was the principal of Glenwood, a flourishing seminary for young ladies. Glenwood seminary never lacked patronage.

Among the pupils was a girl by the name of Margaret Sangerford, an orphan, under the guardianship of the professor of mathematics.

The principal rose from her seat after a long silence, and rang a little silver bill that stood on her desk. A door near immediately opened, and a neatly dressed girl, evidently one of the under teachers, made her appearance.

"Miss Lawson," said the principal, "I wish you to send Margaret Sangerford to me."

"Yes, madam," said the girl. "I will find her and tell her at once."

"The thing must be looked into," murmured the madam. "The girl goes after hours and to a common, low neighborhood. It is time for me to assert my authority. The credit of my school is at stake."

Presently there sounded a light tap at the door.

"Come in," said the madam, looking up a little uneasily. The task before her was evidently an unpleasant one.

A slender figure, clothed in black, with only fine lines of white showing at throat and wrists, made its appearance. The young girl was exquisitely fair.

Margaret's face was calm, sweet and impassive, and the principal paid involuntary homage by a long, admiring glance at the dark eyes, the rich creamy tints of the complexion, the lovely, mobile lips. It was some time before she could gather courage to speak and make the charge which she held against her. When she did, the young girl's face changed. Her complexion seemed to thicken, purple veins marred the symmetry of her forehead, and an angry light burned in her eyes.

"Who has been spying upon me? Who told you that?" she asked, scorn in her voice and contempt in her manner.

"It is nothing to you who told me, Miss Margaret. I only wish to hear the truth from your own lips. A simple denial will answer. Were you out at that hour, and did you go to that place?"

"I decline to answer," said the girl, resolutely, but her lips twitched, and her hands were clasped together more tightly.

"Then I shall have to put the matter in other hands," said the madam. "I must send for your guardian."

"No! no," cried the girl, making a step forward, a deadly pallor overspreading her face. Then the color rushed back under the keen gaze directed upon her.

"Miss Margaret, I give you the opportunity to answer for yourself," said the madam coldly.

"I did go out and it was after the time allowed by the rules," said Margaret, "and I had good and sufficient reasons for what I did."

"Good and sufficient reasons for a deliberate and flagrant disobedience," said the madam, in icy tones, "good and sufficient reasons for rebellion. Very well, then you certainly cannot object to tell me those reasons."

"I do object," said Margaret, desperately, almost sharply. She did not mean to be disrespectful, but she was evidently absorbed in her own distressful thoughts.

"Miss Margaret, your tone and manner are impertinent," said the principal, her face reddening. "You owe it to me, to yourself, your guardian and the school, to explain this matter fully, and I insist that you do so."

"I—cannot, madam," the girl replied, catching her breath, and her expression was like that one sometimes sees on the face of a grieved child.

"That is, you will not. Very well; I shall employ other means, then, to bring the matter to the light. Be assured I shall leave no stone unturned to get at the facts. Till then you will remain in your room until you change your mind or are sent for."

Margaret's countenance fell. She turned slowly, after casting one imploring glance at the face before her, as if to ask for mercy, but madam's countenance remained unchanged. Then she slowly left the room.

An hour from that time, Dr. Marston, professor of mathematics, sent for his ward. The girl went tremblingly down, her face pallid with sudden fear. She scarcely raised her beautiful eyes as she entered his presence.

"Margaret, my child, what is this I hear about you?" was the exclamation with which he greeted her. He was tall, with soft blue eyes, a ruddy color, and a wide expanse of forehead, around which clustered soft, curling hair.

"Nothing wrong, I trust," she said, in a faint voice hoping to gain time.

"Oh, but it is wrong, terribly wrong, and I believe you will not mind explaining the matter to me," he went on in a very kind voice. 'I told the madam it would be all right, that my little girl never deceived me in her life, and she would not begin at this age. Is it some girlish frolic or secret? Was it a little harmless adventure? You know, Margaret, how fully I trust you. You have ever been a loving, dutiful child."

She looked up into his face, that face so grave and sorrowful, so noble in outline, so trustful and fatherly.

"Oh, uncle," she had been all her life used to call him uncle, "please don't ask me," she said, with piteous accents. "Indeed, I have done nothing wrong, but I cannot tell, even you."

"My dear!' he exclaimed, with mild surprise. "Then what shall I say to the madam? She insists upon an explanation. You see, it touches the honor of her school, which is everything to her. She is very indignant—and indeed, you defied her authority in breaking the rules. I have no excuse to offer, unless you give me one. Come, you owe something to her."

"Indeed, uncle, I am so sorry!" said Margaret, earnestly, the tears raining from her eyes, which were now softly luminous. "But you must trust me if she does not. Please don't insist upon my telling you, for—I—cannot."

She had come forward and taken one of his hands in both of hers. Now she bent her head upon it, sobbing. His heart was full of pity for her, but he was at the same time astonished and a little indignant. How could he distrust her? Still, what could he say to the madam, who had every reason to receive her confidence?

"Then, I am not to be answered?" he asked, more sternly than he had ever spoken before.

"Oh, uncle, won't you forgive me—and trust me? I cannot tell you, I cannot," was the sobbing reply.

"Very well," he returned coldly, and resumed the reading of his newspaper with a pained face.

"Uncle! you do believe in me! You do trust me!" she said, frightened at his cold, constrained manner.

"I do not know what to think, what to believe," was his answer. "I must have time to think. You can go to your room."

Almost broken-hearted, Margaret returned to her room and threw herself on the bed in an agony of grief.

That evening the professor of mathematics sat in his room brooding over the events of the day. He had not seen Margaret since he had ordered her to her room in a manner so different from his usual loving solicitude, and his heart ached for her. Her father had been his dearest friend, and he loved the child who was that friend's living image.

"I dare say it is all right," he said, sighing wearily, "but it looks all wrong, only—"

Just then the door burst open, and a haggard face, with wild, restless dark eyes, tangled hair and a glare as of maniacy, looked in upon him.

The professor put up both hands, as if warding off a blow, and groaning, staggered backward and fell into a chair. His face lost all color, his body all motion. He could only stare helplessly, while his breath came shorter and harder.

"Why, father, you're not glad to see me, are you? I'm not exactly a pleasant sight, eh?"

"You—are—not," said the professor, the words seeming to be jerked from his lips by some inward force, not because he wanted to speak, and he shook his head like a man in despair.

"But I had to come."

The man could not have been much over 22 or 23 but his face was marked by deeply cut lines of dissipation, and his manner was reckless to defiance.

"I have come here to tell you something, something for which you will hate and despise me, and which—"

"Don't, Tom, for God's sake, don't," and the professor put up both hands again. "Haven't you broken hearts enough? Your poor mother—"

"Stop father!" said the young man, with almost a sob, "don't say I broke her heart, or I will kill myself, before you."

He deliberately took a pistol from his pocket and placed it on the table. "I don't know but I shall, anyhow."

His father half sprang from his chair. "Sit still, father!" said his son, in firm, hard tones. "I'm not going to harm you. I wouldn't touch a hair of your head, God knows, but I want to tell you all my miserable story. I've been bad enough, Heaven knows, but I never blamed you for disowning me. I've tried to keep honest all financial transactions, till now. I haven't even cheated at cards. But the other day—I stole some money, yes, stole it, and it's known to one or two of the fellows. How long they will keep it a secret, I cannot tell. I haven't the means to repay it—it's a large sum and it has made me desperate. Last night I came to the conclusion that I would just end it all—the misery and the disgrace together. So I went and bought this pistol and loaded it, intending to shoot myself through the head. Then I sat down and wrote to you. I didn't blame you in the least, how could I? You did your best to try and save me, and I kept pulling you down, kept on disgracing you like the pitiful coward I was. Here is the thing I wrote you. I had just signed it, when there was a rap at the door. I threw my handkerchief over the pistol and called 'come in,' thinking it was one of the boys, for they had been there all the afternoon, drinking and smoking. Oh, it was a foul place, smelling of beer and other drinks.

"Who do you think came in? Why, if an angel from the throne of heaven had appeared to me in that den, I should not have been more astonished. And it was an angel. It was Margaret.

"'Tom,' she said, 'I heard you were in great trouble. I came to help you, Tom. I heard—that is, the brother of one of my schoolmates told her—no matter what it was,' she went on hurriedly, 'but uncle must never know about it, it would kill him, he has had so much sorrow.'

"And then she took a little box from a bag she had on her arm, and opened it. There were all her little jewels, and two or three splendid diamond rings.

"'Here, Tom,' she said, 'take them all and sell them. I couldn't very well ask for the money—without giving a reason, or I would have brought you a check. But these will, perhaps, get you out of trouble.'

"I looked at her, dumb with amazement. Her presence had brought back all the beautiful as well as the terrible past, my innocent boyhood—your trust in me—the mother that I—the mother—"

With a great sob the man fell on his knees, and hid his face on his father's shoulder.

The hardness had all gone out of the professor's face. Tears were streaming down his cheeks. He put one arm about the shaking form.

"Poor lad! poor lad!" he murmured, his voice hoarse and broken.

"What could I do?" the young man went on, striving to steady his voice. "She would not go unless I took them, and to get her away from there, I did take them. See, here they are. Not one of them would I sell were it 20 times a ransom. No, for I believe I have found my lost manhood. When she had gone and the blessed light of her presence had faded away, I went down on my knees, and I prayed like one whose soul is in deadly peril. Some strange strength seemed to be given me. At once I decided what to do. I have done it. I make this confession to you, and now I shall go directly to my too confiding employers and tell them what I have done. I shall not plead for mercy. I don't deserve it. If they see fit to mete out a punishment such as the broken law will lay me liable to, I will try and bear it like a man. It is only for your sake I tremble. Would it kill you to know I was in prison, and for theft?"

"No, my boy, not now, but we will try to save you," was the faltering reply. "God bless my little Margaret. It was you she went to see, poor darling! some way she heard you were in trouble, and for my sake—" His voice choked.

"She has saved me," said the other, in low tones, "from worse than robbery. But for her, God only knows where I should be now. I feel like one who has looked into his own grave."

The next morning, Mrs. Gen. Lansingham surprised Margaret by kissing her in the presence of the whole class.

"My dear," she whispered, "you are forgiven. I know it all."

The friends of the professor exerted themselves in behalf of his son. The matter was hushed up and plenty of time given the prodigal in which to repay the sum he had taken. One morning Margaret went to the professor.

"Oh, my dear, dear child," he said, and happy tears stood in his eyes. "You have given me one gift for which I can never sufficiently thank you. You have given me back my son, who was dead to the world and to me."

And Margaret was as she had a right to be, very happy.

THE WAY IT READ.

Editor Had to Admit That This Was Going Too Far.

The editor of a little western paper was in the habit of cheering up his subscribers daily with a column of short pertinent comments on their town, habits, and themselves. The department on account of its intimate personal flavor was the most popular thing in the paper.

The editor, as he saw it growing in favor, gradually allowed himself a wider and wider latitude in his remarks, until the town passed much of its time conjecturing "what he'd das't to say next.'

On a hot day when the simoom whistled gaily up the streets of the town, depositing everywhere its burden of sand, the editor brought forth this gem of thought:

"All the windows along Main street need washing badly."

The next morning he was waited on by a platoon of indignant citizens who confronted him with the paragraph in question fresh from the hands of the compositor and informed him fiercely that he had gone too far. After a hasty and horrified glance he admitted that he had.

It now read:

"All the widows along Main street need washing badly."—"Under the Spreading Chestnut Tree," in Everybody's.

Books of Lead.

A bookbinder was putting a binding of lead on a book.

"Why lead?" a visitor asked.

"This," the binder answered, "is a naval code book, for use on a battleship. All such volumes are bound in lead."

"But why?"

"So that, in the event of the ship's destruction, the books will sink with it, for they contain secrets of immense value and every precaution must be taken to keep these secrets dark."

A FIGHT FOR LIFE.

Member of Scouting Party Digs ...y Through Mountain of Snow to Sa ...

That a battle is worth fighting to the very end, no matter how discouraging the situation or how apparently implacable the foe, is shown in Mr. J. W. Steele's "Sketches" of the army frontier. If courage and strength had given out only a few moments sooner the hero of the story would never have told the tale.

A certain young soldier was one of a western scouting party which was exploring the headwaters of the Gila. A snowstorm had caused the company to lose their way, and they rode, day after day, silent in the dread of coming cold and starvation.

As long as the snow melted in the sun they could control their thirst, and hares supplied them with food. One night, while the party was camping, a soldier, walking by himself, thought he saw a path. Following it along for a little way, he sat down in the shelter of a boulder. Suddenly he heard a great rushing noise as of a furious wind. An avalanche swept down the mountainside, sending a great white bulk into the valley. The soldier crept near the shelter of the rock, while the roar deafened him, and the foaming white sea of snow settled over him.

The camp was not touched. In the morning, when the members of the party woke, they missed their comrade, and saw what had happened. Looking at the great heap of snow they said, "He is dead," and went on their way.

The soldier, however, was not dead. He was hemmed in between the rock on one side and a white wall of snow on the other, while over him the avalanche lay like a pall. The rock was hollowed out in a way which gave him protection and beneath him was a bed of dry pine-needles. A dim blue light filtered through the covering and showed the crystal outlines of the hopeless house.

He called, but the sound came back to his own ears. He did not lack for air. He could touch the rock and earth, and they seemed friendly. He was not cold, for the snow lay like piles of blankets, and the earth radiated steam.

The soldier began to dig. His fingers soon grew stiff and numb, but he kept on, hour after hour, until the opaline mass grew dim, and he knew the early night had come. Then he crawled backward through the tunnel he had made, and slept by the rock.

When he woke he knew by his watch that five hours had gone. He was frightened that so long a time had passed and that no one had come to save him. He crept through the narrow tunnel and began digging again, lying prone and pressing the snow beneath him. Hours passed. Blood from his fingers stained the snow and his hands almost refused their office. Dark began to come again. His hands were terribly swollen, but he worked for life. His throat was sore and raw, and he ate snow to quench his burning thirst. His weariness was unutterable, yet he toiled on.

At last it seemed as if he could see that the dim light was growing brighter. This spurred his exhausted energy.

A hunter, living in the wild valley, returning to his hut, saw a curious cavity in the snow, and exp... it. To his amazement, there lay a blue-clad figure, face downward, arms outstretched. Under his rough but kindly care the soldier recovered. A few moments more and life would have fled.

Will Be Remembered.

Finch, who wrote "The Blue and the Gray," was a true singer as well as an upright judge, and though he has passed on to join the angelic choir, he will be remembered long for the pathos of his lines:

"Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the judgment day,
Love and tears for the blue,
Tears and love for the gray."

Hampton's fingers twitched in a nervousness altogether unusual to the man, yet when he spoke his voice was like steel. "Your suspicions are highly interesting, and your cowardly insinuations base. However, if, as I suppose, your purpose is to provoke a quarrel, you will find me quite ready to accommodate you."

An instant they stood thus, eye to eye. Suddenly Brant's memory veered to the girl whose name would be smirched by any blow struck between them, and he forced back the hasty retort burning upon his lips.

"You may be, Mr. Hampton," he said, standing like a statue, his back to the door, "but I am not. As you say, fighting is my trade, yet I have never sought a personal quarrel. Nor is there any cause here, as my only purpose in asking the question was to forewarn you, and, her through you, that such a suggestion had been openly made in my hearing. I presume it was a lie, and wished to be able to brand it so."

"By whom?"

"A fellow known as Silent Murphy, a government scout."

"I have heard of him. Where is he?"

"He claimed to be here waiting orders from Custer. He had camp up the creek two days ago, but is keeping well out of sight for some reason. Telegrams have been received for him at the office, but another man has called for them."

"Who?"

"Red Slavin."

"The cur!" said Hampton. "I reckon there is a bad half-hour waiting for those two fellows. What was it that Murphy said?"

"That he knew the girl's real name."

"Was that all?"

"Yes; I tried to discover his meaning, but the fellow became suspicious and shut up like a clam. Is there anything in it?"

Hampton ignored the question. "Lieut. Brant," he said, "I am glad we have had this talk together, and exceedingly sorry that my duty has compelled me to say what I have said. Some time, however, you will sincerely thank me for it, and rejoice that you escaped so easily. I knew your father once, and I should like now to part on friendly relations with his son."

He held out his hand, and scarcely knowing why he did so, Brant placed his own within its grasp, and as the eyes of the two men met, there was a consciousness of sympathy between them.

CHAPTER XVIII.

A Slight Interruption.

The young officer passed slowly down the dark staircase, his mind still bewildered by the result of the interview. His feelings toward Hampton had been materially changed. He found it impossible to nurse a dislike which seemingly had no real cause for existence.

Yet Brant was far from being satisfied. Hampton had not even advanced a direct claim; he had dodged the real issue, leaving the soldier in the dark regarding his relationship to Naida, and erecting a barrier between the other two. It was a masterpiece of defense, puzzling, irritating, seemingly impassable. From the consideration of it all, Brant emerged with but one thought clearly defined—whoever she might prove to be, whatever was her present connection with Hampton, he loved this dark-eyed, auburn-haired waif. He knew it now, and never again could he doubt it. He paused, half inclined to retrace his steps and have the matter out. He turned just in time to face a dazzling vision of fluffy lace and flossy hair beside him in the dimly lighted hall.

"Oh, Lieutenant Brant!" and the vision clung to his arm tenderly. "It is such a relief to find that you are unhurt. Did—did you kill him?"

Brant stared. "I—I fear I scarcely compehend, Miss Spencer. I have certainly taken no one's life. What can you mean?"

"Oh, I am so glad; and Naida will be, too. I must go right back and tell the poor girl, for she is nearly distracted. Oh, Lieutenant, isn't it the most romantic situation that ever was? And he is such a mysterious character!"

"To whom do you refer? Really, I am quite in the dark."

"Why, Mr. Hampton, of course. Oh, I know all about it. Naida felt so badly after your meeting this morning that she just compelled her to confide her whole story to me. And didn't you fight at all?"

"Most assuredly not," and Brant's eyes began to exhibit amusement; "indeed, we parted quite friendly."

"I told Naida I thought you would. People don't take such things so seriously nowadays, do they? But Naida is such a child and so full of romantic notions, that she worried terribly about it. Isn't it perfectly delightful what he is going to do for her?"

"I am sure I do not know."

"Why, hadn't you heard? He wants to send her east to a boarding school and give her a fine education. Do you know, Lieutenant, I am simply dying to see him? he is such a perfectly splendid western character.

"It would afford me pleasure to present you," and the soldier's downcast face brightened with anticipation.

"Do—do you really think it would be proper? But they do things so differently out here, don't they? Oh, I wish you would."

Feeling somewhat doubtful as to what might be the result, Brant knocked upon the door he had just closed, and, in response to the voice within, opened it. Hampton sat upon the chair by the window, but as his eyes caught a glimpse of the returned soldier with a woman standing beside him, he instantly rose to his feet.

"Mr. Hampton," said Brant, "I trust I may be pardoned for again troubling you, but this is Miss Spencer, a great admirer of western life, who is desirous of making your acquaintance."

Miss Spencer swept gracefully forward, her cheeks flushed, her hand extended. "Oh, Mr. Hampton, I have so wished to meet with you ever since I first read your name in Aunt Lydia's letters—Mrs. Herndon is my aunt, you know—and all about that awful time you had with those Indians. You see, I am Naida Gillis's most particular friend, and she tells me so much about you. She is such a dear, sweet girl! She felt so badly this morning over your meeting with Lieut. Brant, fearing you might quarrel! It was such a relief to find him unhurt, but I felt that I must see you also, so as to relieve Naida's mind entirely."

"I most certainly appreciate your frankly expressed interest, Miss Spencer," he said, standing with her hand still retained in his, "and am exceedingly glad there is one residing in this community to whom my peculiar merits are apparent."

Miss Spencer sparkled instantly, her cheeks rosy. "I do wish you would some time tell me about your exploits. Why, Mr. Hampton, perhaps if you were to call upon me, you might see Naida, too. I wish you knew Mr. Moffat, but as you don't, perhaps you might come with Lieut. Brant."

Hampton bowed. "I would hardly venture thus to place myself under the protection of Lieut. Brant, although I must confess the former attractions of the Herndon home are now greatly increased. From my slight knowledge of Mr. Moffat's capabilities, I fear I should be found a rather indifferent entertainer; yet I sincerely hope we shall meet again at a time when I can 'a tale unfold.'"

"How nice that will be, and I am so grateful to you for the promise. By the bye, only this very morning a man stopped me on the street, actually mistaking me for Naida."

"What sort of a looking man, Miss Spencer?"

"Large, and heavily set, with a red beard. He was exceedingly polite when informed of his mistake, and said he merely had a message to deliver to Miss Gillis. But he refused to tell it to me."

The glances of the two men met, but Brant was unable to decipher the meaning hidden within the gray eyes. Neither spoke, and Miss Spencer, never realizing what her chatter meant, rattled merrily on.

"You see there are so many who speak to me now, because of my public position here. So I thought nothing strange at first, until I discovered his mistake, and then it seemed so absurd that I nearly laughed outright. Isn't it odd what such a man could possibly want with her? But really, gentlemen, I must return with my news; Naida will be so anxious. I am glad to have met you both."

Hampton bowed politely, and Brant conducted her silently down the stairway. "I greatly regret not being able to accompany you home," he explained, "but I came down on horseback, and my duty requires that I return at once to the camp."

"Oh, indeed! how very unfortunate for me!" Even as she said so, some unexpected vision beyond flushed her cheeks prettily. "Why, Mr. Wynkoop," she exclaimed, "I am so glad you happened along, and going my way, too, I am sure. Good morning, Lieutenant; I shall feel perfectly safe with Mr. Wynkoop."

CHAPTER XIX.

The Door Opens, and Closes Again.

In one sense Hampton had greatly enjoyed Miss Spencer's call. Her bright, fresh face, her impulsive speech, her unquestioned beauty, had had their effect upon him, changing for the time being the gloomy trend of his thoughts.

But gradually the slight smile of amusement faded from his eyes. Something, which he had supposed lay securely hidden behind years and distance, had all at once come back to haunt him—the unhappy ghost of an expiated crime, to do evil to this girl Naida. Two men, at least, knew sufficient of the past to cause serious trouble. This effort by Slavin to hold personal communication with the girl was evidently made for some definite purpose. Hampton decided to have a face-to-face interview with the man himself; he was accustomed to fight his battles in the open, and to a finish. A faint hope, which had been growing dimmer and dimmer with every passing year, began to flicker once again within his heart. He desired to see this man Murphy, and to learn exactly what he knew.

He entered the almost deserted saloon opposite the hotel, across the threshold of which he had not stepped for two years, and the man behind the bar glanced up apprehensively.

"Red Slavin?" he said. "Well, now, see here, Hampton, we don't want no trouble in this shebang."

"I'm not here seeking a fight, Jim," returned the inquirer, genially. "I merely wish to ask 'Red' an unimportant question or two."

"He's there in the back room, I reckon, but he's damn liable to take a pot shot at you when you go in."

Hampton's genial smile only broadened, as he carelessly rolled an unlight cigar between his lips.

He walked to the door, flung it swiftly and silently open, and stepping within, closed it behind him with his left hand. In the other glittered the steel-blue barrel of a drawn revolver.

"Slavin, sit down!"

The terse, imperative words seemed fairly to cut the air, and the red-bearded gambler, who had half risen to his feet, an oath upon his lips, sank back into his seat, staring at the apparition confronting him as if fascinated.

"Put your hands on the table, and keep them there!" he said. "Now, my dear friend, I have come here in peace, not war, and take these slight precautions merely because I have heard a rumor that you have indulged in a threat or two since we last parted, and I know something of your impetuous disposition. I regret the necessity, but trust you are resting comfortably."

"Oh, go to hell!"

"We will consider that proposition somewhat later." Hampton laid his hat with calm deliberation on the table. "No doubt, Mr. Slavin,—if you move that hand again I'll fill your system with lead—you experience some very natural curiosity regarding the object of my unanticipated, yet I hope no less welcome visit."

Slavin's only reply was a curse, his bloodshot eyes roaming the room furtively.

"I suspected as much," Hampton went on, coolly. "Indeed, I should have felt hurt had you been indifferent upon such an occasion. It does credit to your heart, Slavin. Come now, keep your eyes on me! I was about to gratify your curiosity, and, in the first place, I came to inquire solicitously regarding the state of your health during my absence, and incidentally to ask why you are exhibiting so great an interest in Miss Naida Gillis."

Slavin straightened up, his great hands clinching nervously, drops of perspiration appearing on his red forehead. "I don't understand your damned fun."

Hampton's lips smiled unpleasantly. "Slavin, you greatly discourage me. The last time I was here you exhibited so fine a sense of humor that I was really quite proud of you. Yet, truly, I think you do understand this joke. Your memory can scarcely be failing at your age.—Make another motion like that and you die right there! You know me.—However, as you seem to shy over my first question, I'll honor you with a second—Where's Silent Murphy?"

"You devil!" Slavin roared, "what do you mean?"

With revolver hand resting on the table, the muzzle pointing at the giant's heart, Hampton leaned forward, utterly remorseless now, and keen as an Indian on the trail.

"Do you know who I am?"

The horror in Slavin's eyes had changed to sullenness, but he nodded silently.

"How do you know?"

There was no reply, although the thick lips appeared to move.

"Answer me, you red sneak! Do you think I am here to be played with? Answer!"

Slavin gulped down something which seemed threatening to choke him, but he durst not lift a hand to wipe the sweat from his face. "If—if I didn't have this beard on you might guess. I thought you knew me all the time."

Hampton stared at him, still puzzled. "I have certainly seen you somewhere. I thought that from the first. Where was it?"

"I was in B Troop, Seventh cavalry."

"B Troop? Brant's troop?"

The big gambler nodded. "That's how I knew you, Captain," he said, speaking with greater ease, "but I never had no reason to say anything about it round here. You was allers decent enough ter me."

"Possibly"—and it was plainly evident from his quiet tone Hampton had steadied from his first surprise,—"the boot was on the other leg, and you had some good reason not to say anything."

Slavin did not answer, but he wet his lips with his tongue, his eyes on the window.

"Who is the fellow Murphy?"

"He was corporal in that same troop, sir." The ex-cavalryman dropped insensibly into his old form of speech. "He knew you too, and we talked it over, and decided to keep still, because it was none of our affair anyhow."

"Where is he now?"

"He left last night with army dispatches for Cheyenne."

Hampton's eyes hardened perceptibly, and his fingers closed more tightly about the butt of his revolver. "You lie, Slavin! The last message did not reach here until this morning. That fellow is hiding somewhere in this camp, and the two of you have been trying to get at the girl. Now, damn you, what is your little game?"

The big gambler was thinking harder then, perhaps, than he had ever thought in his life before. He knew Hampton would kill him if he needed to do so, but he likewise realized that he was not likely to fire until he had gained the information he was seeking. If he only knew how much information the other possessed it would be easy enough. As he did not, he must wield his weapon blindly.

"You're makin' a devil of a fuss over little or nothin'," he growled, simulating a tone of disgust. "I ain't never hed no quarrel with ye, except'n' fer the way ye managed ter skin me at the table 'bout two years ago. I don't give two screeches in hell for who you are; an' besides, I reckon you ain't the only ex-convict a-ranging Dakota either fer the matter o' that. No more does Murphy. We ain't no bloomin' detectives, an' we ain't buckin' in no business o' yourn; ye kin just bet your sweet life on thet."

"Where is Murphy, then? I wish to see the fellow."

"I told you he'd gone. Maybe he didn't git away till this mornin', but he's gone now all right. What in thunder do ye want o' him? I reckon I kin tell ye all that Murphy knows."

For a breathless moment neither spoke, Hampton fingering his gun nervously, his eyes lingering on that brutal face.

"Slavin," he said at last, his voice hard, metallic. "I've figured it out, and I do know you now, you lying brute. You are the fellow who swore you saw me throw away the gun that did the shooting, and that afterwards you picked it up."

There was the spirit of murder in his eyes, and the gambler cowered back before them, trembling like a child.

"I—I only swore to the last part, Captain," he muttered, his voice scarcely audible. "I—I never said I saw you throw—"

"And I swore," went on Hampton, "that I would kill you on sight. You lying whelp, are you ready to die?"

Slavin's face was drawn and gray, the perspiration standing in beads upon his forehead, but he could neither speak nor think, fascinated by those remorseless eyes, which seemed to burn their way down into his very soul.

"No? Well, then, I will give you, today, just one chance to live—one, you dog—one. Don't move an eyelash! Tell me honestly why you have been trying to get word with the girl, and you shall go out from here living. Lie to me about it, and I am going to kill you where you sit, as I would a mad dog. You know me, Slavin—now speak!"

So intensely still was it, Hampton could distinguish the faint ticking of the watch in his pocket, the hiss of the breath between the giant's clinched teeth. No wretch dragged shrieking to the scaffold could have formed a more pitiful sight, but there was no mercy in the eyes of the man watching him.

"Speak, you cringing hound!"

Slavin gripped his great hands together convulsively, his throat swelling beneath its read beard. He knew there was no way of escape. "I—I had to do it! My God, Captain, I had to do it!"

"Why?"

"I had to, I tell you. Oh, you devil, you fiend! I'm not the one you're after—it's Murphy!"

For a single moment Hampton stared at the cringing figure. Then suddenly he rose to his feet in decision. "Stand up! Lift up your hands first, you fool. Now unbuckle your gunbelt with your left hand—your left, I said! Drop it on the floor."

There was an unusual sound behind, such as a rat might have made, and Hampton glanced aside apprehensively. In that single second Slavin was upon him, grasping his pistol-arm at the wrist, and striving with hairy hand to get a death-grip about his throat. Twice Hampton's left drove straight out into that red, gloating face, and then the giant's crushing weight bore him backward. He fought savagely, silently, his slender figure like steel, but Slavin got his grip at last, and with giant strength began to crunch his victim within his vise-like arms. There was a moment of superhuman strain, their breathing mere sobs of exhaustion. Then Slavin slipped, and Hampton succeeded in wriggling partially free from his death grip. It was scarcely an instant, yet it served; for as he bent aside, swinging his burly opponent with him, someone struck a vicious blow at his back; but the descending knife, missing its mark, sunk instead deep into Slavin's breast.

Hampton saw the flash of a blade, a portion of an arm, and then the clutching fingers of Slavin swept him down. He reached out blindly as he fell, his hand closing about the deserted knife-hilt. The two crashed down together upon the floor, the force of the fall driving the blade home to the gambler's heart.

CHAPTER XX.

The Cohorts of Judge Lynch.

Hampton staggered blindly to his feet, looking down on the motionless body. For a moment the room appeared to swim before his eyes, and he clutched at the overturned table for support. Then, as his senses returned, he perceived the figures of a number of men jamming the narrow doorway, and became aware of their loud, excited voices. Back to his benumbed brain there came with a rush the whole scene, the desperation of his present situation. He had been found alone with the dead man. Those men, when they came surging in attracted by the noise of strife, had found him lying on Slavin, his hand clutching the knife-hilt. He ran his eyes over their horrified faces, and knew instantly they held him the murderer.

The shock of this discovery steadied him. He realized the meaning, the dread, terrible meaning, for he knew the west, its fierce, implacable spirit of vengeance, its merciless code of lynch-law. The vigilantes of the mining camps were to him an old story; more than once he had witnessed their work, been cognizant of their power. This was no time to parley or to hesitate. He grabbed the loaded revolver lying upon the floor, and swung Slavin's discarded belt across his shoulder.

"Stand aside, gentlemen," he commanded. "Step back, and let me pass!"

They obeyed. He swept them with watchful eyes, stepped past and slammed the door behind him. Men were already beginning to pour into the saloon, uncertain yet of the facts, and shouting questions to each other. Totally ignoring these, Hampton thrust himself recklessly through the crowd. Half-way down the broad steps Buck Mason faced him, in shirt sleeves, his head uncovered, an ugly "45" in his uplifted hand. Just an instant the eyes of the two men met, neither doubted the grim purpose of the other.

"You've got ter do it, Bob," announced the marshall, shortly, "dead er alive."

Hampton never hesitated. "I'm sorry I met you. I don't want to get anybody else mixed up in this fuss. If you'll promise me a chance for my life, Buck, I'll throw up my hands. But I prefer a bullet to a mob."

The little marshal was sandy-haired, freckle-faced, and all nerve. The crowd jammed within the Occidental had already turned and were surging toward the door. Hampton knew from long experience what this meant; these were the quickly inflamed cohorts of Judge Lynch—they would act first, and reflect later. His square jaws set like a trap.

"All right, Bob," said the marshal. "You're my prisoner, and there'll be one hell of a fight afore them lads git ye. There's a chance left—leg it after me."

Just as the mob surged out of the Occidental, cursing and struggling, the two sprang forward and dashed into the narrow space between the livery stable and the hotel. Moffat chanced to be in the passageway, and pausing to ask no questions, Mason promptly landed that gentleman on the back of his head in a pile of discarded tin cans, and kicked viciously at a yellow dog which ventured to snap at them as they swept past. Behind arose a volley of curses, the thud of feet, an occasional voice roaring out orders, and a sharp spat of revolver shots. One ball plugged into the siding of the hotel, and a second threw a spit of sand into their lowered faces, but neither man glanced back. They were running for their lives now, racing for a fair chance to turn at bay and fight, their sole hope the steep, rugged hill in their front. Hampton began to understand the purpose of his companion, the quick, unerring instinct which had led him to select the one suitable spot where the successful waging of battle against such odds was possible—the deserted dump of the Shasta mine.

With every nerve strained to the uttermost, the two men raced side by side down the steep slope, ploughed through the tangled underbrush, and toiled up the sharp ascent beyond.

At the summit of the ore dump the two men flung themselves panting down, for the first time able to realize what it all meant. They could perceive the figures of their pursuers among the shadows of the bushes below, but these were not venturing out into the open—the first mad, heedless rush had evidently ended. There were some cool heads among the mob leaders, and it was highly probable that negotiations would be tried before that crowd hurled itself against two desperate men, armed and entrenched. Both fugitives realized this, and lay there coolly watchful, their breath growing more regular, their eyes softening.

"Whut is all this fuss about, anyhow?" questioned the marshall, evidently somewhat aggrieved. "I wus just eatin' dinner when a feller stuck his head in an' yelled ye'd killed somebody over at the Occidental."

Hampton turned his face gravely toward him. "Buck, I don't know whether you'll believe me or not, but I guess you never heard me tell a lie, or knew of my trying to dodge out of a bad scrape. Besides, I haven't anything to gain now, for I reckon you're planning to stay with me, guilty or not guilty, but I did not kill that fellow. I don't exactly see how I can prove it, the way it all happened, but I give you my word as a man, I did not kill him."

Mason looked him squarely in the eyes, his teeth showing behind his stiff, closely clipped mustache. Then he deliberately extended his hand, and gripped Hampton's. "Of course I believe ye. Not that you're any too blame good, Bob, but you ain't the kind what pleads the baby act. Who was the feller?"

"Red Slavin."

"No!" and the hand grip perceptibly tightened. "Holy Moses, what ingratitude! Why, the camp ought to get together and give ye a vote of thanks, and instead, here they are trying their level best to hang you. Cussedest sorter thing a mob is, anyhow; goes like a flock o' sheep after a leader, an' I bet I could name the fellers who are a-runnin' that crowd. How did the thing happen?"

Both men were intently observing the ingathering of their scattered pursuers, but Hampton answered gravely, telling his brief story with careful detail, appreciating the importance of reposing full confidence in this quiet, resourceful companion.

"All I really saw of the fellow," he concluded, "was a hand and arm as they drove in the knife. You can see there is where it ripped me, and the unexpected blow of the man's body knocked me forward, and of course I fell on Slavin. It may be I drove the point further in when I came down, but that was an accident. The fact is, Buck, I have every reason to wish Slavin to live. I was just getting out of him some information I needed."

Mason nodded, his eyes wandering from Hampton's expressive face to the crowd beginning to collect beneath the shade of a huge oak a hundred yards below.

"Never carry a knife, do ye?"

"No."

"Thought not; always heard you fought with a gun. Caught no sight of the feller after ye got up?"

"All I saw was the crowd blocking the doorway. I knew they had caught me lying on Slavin, with my hand grasping the knife-hilt, and, somehow, I couldn't think of anything just then but how to get out of there into the open. I've seen vigilantes turn loose before, and knew what was likely to happen!"

"Sure. Recognize anybody in that first bunch?"

"Big Jim, the bartender, was the only one I knew; he had a bung-starter in his hand."

Mason nodded thoughtfully, his mouth puckered. "It's him, and half a dozen other fellers of the same stripe, who are kickin' up all this fracas. The most of 'em are yonder now, an' if it wusn't fer leavin' a prisoner unprotected, darn me if I wudn't like to mosey right down thar an' pound a little hoss sense into that bunch o' cattle. Thet's 'bout the only thing ye kin do fer a plum fool, so long as the law won't let ye kill him."

"I'm really sorry that you got mixed up in this, Buck," said Hampton, "for it looks to me about nine chances out of ten against either of us getting away from here unhurt."

"Oh, I don't know. It's bin my experience thet there's allers chances if

THE PENSION OUTLOOK.

The most striking exhibit in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal year 1906-'07 is the net decrease of 18,600 in the pension roll. The number of pensioners on June 30 was 967,371, the smallest total since 1894. Before the passage of the dependent pension act of 1890 the pension list carried about five hundred thousand names. Between 1890 and 1894 the total rose to 969,544 and from 1898 to 1905 it fluctuated between 991,519 and 999,446. It has now begun to decrease materially, despite new and highly liberal legislation, and there is reason to think that in the next five years it will drop well below nine hundred thousand.

The cost of the pension system has varied little year by year in the last decade. In 1897-'98 it was $138,765,000. Since then it has ranged from $141,942,000 in 1903-'04 to $161,335,000 in 1901-,02. Last year it was $141,464,000. Predictions were made when President Roosevelt issued his much discussed age order in 1904, constituting age as a disability, subject to evidence in rebuttal, that it would increase the cost of pensions as much as $12,000,000. The Tribune held that the added cost would hardly be noticeable in the annual appropriation This has been the case, for the appropriation for 1906-'07, after three years of administration under that order, is the smallest with one exception since 1893-'94. Congress passed on February 6 last an age pension act, increasing the allowances made under the Roosevelt order. This act it was prophesied, would entail a similar large expansion of pension payments. But, though 120,355 claims have been allowed under the provisions of the act of February 6, the total pension payments remain about stationary. The Commissioner of Pensions estimates that pension obligations were increased $6,394,000 by the McCumber age pension law. But this increase was offset by the normal shrinkage of the roll due to deaths (of which there were 35,768) and to other causes.

The fact seems to be that expenditure touched its high water mark some years ago and that a shrinkage in payments is now imminent. The annual outlay has been kept above $140,000,000 by the workings of new legislation, admitting applicants ineligible under previous laws and increasing rates of payment. The average value of pensions in nearly every class has been raised and the general average value of all pensions has been forced up from $133.49 in 1903 to $145.60 in 1907. But the pensionable material is now pretty well exhausted, and, though continuing to do the fullest justice to the veteran and his dependents, the government will soon see its outlay on their account curtailed by many millions.

THE REPUBLICAN acknowledges with many thanks, the receipt on Tuesday evening, of a number of flowers which were sent us through the mails by Mrs. Eliza Gnagey, of Pasadena, Cal., among the blooms being a magnificent rose which retained its scent to a very remarkable degree, considering the distance it came and the condition of the weather. The flowers were seen by many, among the number being a dear old lady now approaching her ninetieth year, whose heart and memory is as young as the flowers she so much admired.

We understand that the larger cream concerns of the city have inaugurated a movement whereby they expect to kill off, or at least badly injure, small local creameries. Their plan seems to be to offer larger prices for cream than the local creameries can afford to pay, but ever remember that after the small concern is closed up, that they can have the produce at whatsoever price the trust may fix upon. We hope that the farmers will not bite the golden hook, but will continue to patronize their home creameries, those little institutions which have brought so many yellow chunks of prosperity to our state.

TRANSPORTING MAILS BEFORE THE REVOLUTION

Some Features of a Crude Institution From Which Has Been Evolved The Modern Postal System.

A certain amount of imagination is required of him who would picture accurately in his mind's eye the postal service of Maryland in Colonial and early national days. Bald statistics of themselves can mean little to the average reader, for instantly he will begin to use them comparatively with data of modern times, and the early postal system must be seen all by itself—isolated, as it were—if it is to be seen in an informing light.

First of all, it must be borne in mind that the several competitors of communication by mail were then undreamed of or, at best, in their infant days. The newspaper, which today does so much to keep man in touch with the more important events in the lives of his acquaintances, was then a thing of little news and much pendanticism. The editors were on a par, so far as their views of journalism were concerned, with many a college professor of our own day, and their news columns frequently harbored, instead of news, lengthy excerpts from the Latin and other masters. This state of affairs was due not so much to the fact that the center of publication was, like Mother Hubbard's cupboard, bare of material, but because the publisher lacked that inventive turn of mind which characterizes the modern newspaper man.

The newspaper then was not the means of keeping a reader in close touch with his friends at home or abroad. The telephone and the telegraph—two other competitors of the modern mail service—were still nothing more than visionary ideas in the heads of little cherubs who had not yet been sent from heaven to inhabit the earth, while it is doubtful if the wireless telegraph had even been thought of so much as vaguely by any cherub.

And thus it was that the mail was a mighty big factor in the lives of those colonists who would keep in touch with men living in other sections of the country or abroad.

Finally the fact must not be lost sight of that there were even greater reasons in Colonial days for residents of Maryland to communicate with those living far from the province of the Calverts than there is in the present day. Many an early settler of Maryland had been torn from his home that he might people a new land in which the promise of success in money-making or the freedom of thought and action or an abundance of prospective adventure were magnets of attraction.

This man might carry with him his family or he might leave his closest relatives in the old land; but his isolation in a sparsely populated country, whether alone or with a few kinsmen, would almost certainly make him feel the need of maintaining a means of communication with them.

Then, too, his business transactions as a rule would almost certainly make it necessary for him to keep in touch with the merchants of Europe, whether he appeared in the role of buyer or seller, and in all of these things he found that he had to put great dependence upon the agency of letters. But what was the nature of that agency.

The postoffice is only partly a modern creation. In the days of Rome's greatest prosperity, for example, there were established along the chief roads or highways posts where stationed couriers, and by the means of a chain of such stations both news and dispatches were sent over the country. This was also true in later days in some of the Oriental countries. But in most, if not all, of these instances the service was maintained by the Government for governmental business.

In the mother country of the American colonies a system of postal service, even approaching in primeval crudeness that of the Romans, was not established until the closing quarter of the fifteenth century. It was at this time that Edward IV was making war on Scotland, and he organized a line of posts with relays of horses connecting, probably, York with Edinburgh. But when the conflict had ended the postal service was discontinued.

The source from which sprang energy for the creation of substantial mail service was not, however, found in governments or in legislative halls, but in the world of commerce, and the chief incentive was the need of the merchant to reach the outside world by some more economical plan than that of private messenger.

Thus in 1514 the merchants of London established a post service with the outports of the country. They controlled the enterprise absolutely, appointing their own postmasters.

But in 1568 the Government, which had been called in to settle a dispute between the merchants, decided to conduct the enterprise itself. It was not until 1710, when the English postoffice was undergoing remodeling, that the colonies in America became a tangible part of the system, and it was then that offices were set up in the three kingdoms—at London, Edinburgh and Dublin—as well as in New York and the West Indies.

It must not, however, be supposed that the American colonies waited for the establishment of this governmental postoffice branch in New York. Long before the time when the American office was established a system of mail service had been in operation. History does not give—nor could it have been expected to give—the time nor the manner of the actual beginning of a mail service in America.

Royal or governmental messages were usually carried to the state by a special messenger, although some documents of lesser importance might have been transported in a less formal and also less expensive manner. Personal letters, however, had to be sent, and the senders of these could not, as a rule, afford to hire a special messenger to carry them, especially if they were to go from England to Maryland.

The skippers of vessels, whether they traveled from colony to colony or from one sea coast to the other, were soon impressed into service as letter carriers, and when a ship was scheduled to clear for some foreign port it became a common practice for those wishing to communicate with residents of the destination towns to intrust to the captain or some official of the ship mail matter for the people whose home the vessel was to visit.

It is not difficult to see how the sailing vessel in those days, therefore, came to wear as welcome an appearance as the letter carrier does today to the average citizen. The vessel not only brought foreign papers, but it would also carry, in addition to this mail matter, the latest news current in its last port, and this was conveyed by word of mouth from the sailors to the colonists.

Looking back, one can see how the sight of the ship—still a great distance off—would arouse great interest, and how its final arrival at its moorings would find the landing well crowded with eager and curious spectators, some expecting letters and others simply there to hear the latest news of the great world, which in those days was, in truth, a very big world.

As the sending of letters became more common there naturally arose difficulties which are encountered today in the postal service. For instance, a letter might be addressed to a man at some port from which he had already removed or who during its passage had died, and if he left no heirs or administrators then the letters were thrown upon the hands of someone who filled the part today played by the Dead Letter Office. At all events, there arose a need that some particular place should be designated as the recognized station for depositing letters for colonists, and very naturally the coffee house was chosen.

The coffee house in those days was an influential factor in the public and social life of a community. Here congregated the great men and the small of the land, and the latter were edified by the discourse of their learned fellow-citizens, while the great men, no doubt, were frequently amused by the small talk of their less richly endowed countrymen.

At all events, the coffee house or coffee houses were in those days, both in Europe and America, much what the club is today in the social world, and people, it must be remembered, had fully as much time to employ at idle gossip as the most solid clubman of modern times.

In the natural course of evolution the coffee house became the postoffice, and here was deposited not only the mail brought by an incoming vessel for the colonists, but here, too, were left letters to be sent by some vessel expected to sail from the port to foreign lands. The coffee house proprietor became practically, if not actually, the postmaster of the town.

The coffee house postoffice could spread its usefulness; thus it expanded from the clearing house of ship mail to a place for the interchange of inland mail. A colonist wishing to send a message to another colonist might find the distance between them too great to be traveled for the delivery of the letter, and yet, knowing that his fellow-countrymen would visit a particular coffee house some time in the near future, he might carry the communication there and leave it until such time as it might be called for.

This manner of interchanging letters was crude and insecure, and it was found necessary to establish some sort of a recognized postoffice. As an outcome of this want the Colony of Massachusetts in 1639 passed a resolution to the effect: "It is ordered that notice be given that Richard Fairbanks, his house in Boston, is the place appointed for all letters which are brought from beyond the seas or are to be sent thither to be left with him, and he is to take care that they are to be delivered or sent according to the directions, and he is allowed for every letter a penny, and he must answer all miscarriage through his neglect in this kind."

Here was a move towards placing the responsibility for the safety of mail. It was a step forward in the handling of mail, but the radical aspect of the advance must have impressed certain "mossbacks" of the colony, for it was further explained, as if in deference to the wishes of certain fearful souls, that "no man shall be compelled to bring his letters thither except he please."

But in time even this authorized postoffice failed to satisfy the people, and in 1677 sundry merchants petitioned the General Court, then sitting in Boston, as follows: "We, whose names are underwritten, hearing many complaints made by merchants and others, and several of us being sensible of the loss of letters, wherby merchants especially with their friends and employers in foreign parts, are greatly damnified; many times the letters imposted are thrown upon the exchange so that who will may take them up; no person without satisfaction being willing to trouble their houses therewith; so that letters of great moment are frequently lost; our humble request, therefore, to this honorable court is that they will please depute some person to take in and convey letters according to direction."

Prior to 1661 the transportation of mail in the Colony of Maryland was conducted in a free-and-easy manner. The letters—delived to some recognized place of deposit in any of the earlier towns—were there open to the gaze and examination of the curious as well as the dishonest. There was passed in 1661 an act which sought to improve the conveyance of letters concerning the State and public affairs; but private mail still hobbled along in its haphazard way.

In the year 1665, however, a regular post was established between the Potomac and Philadelphia. The first post-rider appointed was John Perry, who was paid the salary—or, perhaps, it should be termed honorarium—of £5 a year. He had a route prescribed, which he was to cover at least eight times a year. When the dangers and inconveniences of travel in those days are considered and the full length of this postal route is taken into account, Letter Carrier Perry was not liberally renumerated for his services.

He began his journey at Newton's Point, on the Potomac, from which place he travelled to Allan's Mill, then Benedict, on the Patuxent, Leonardtown, on Briton's Bay, George Lingan's, William Lawkins', South River, Annapolis, Kent, Williamstadt, Daniel Toad's, Adam Peterson's then to New Castle, and from there to Philadelphia.

When it is borne in mind that Mr. Perry received just $30 each for one of these trips through the length of the State and to Philadelphia, traveling a large part of the way through wild country infested with beasts and, perhaps, scalp-coveting Indians, then he appears much more in the light of an underpaid public servant than the complaining letter carrier of today, who receives about $1,000 for covering a little city route.

Just how satisfactorily this pioneer letter carrier of Maryland performed his work is unknown, but in 1714 the Assembly was prompted to pass an act for the more speedy conveyance of letters and also to correct abuses of opening letters. It appears that upon the most trivial grounds permission was granted to open letters intrusted to the handlers of mail matter.

It is possible that if a postmaster's wife were interested in the love affairs of some belle of the town, and a letter came from one of her suitors, the official's spouse would instruct him to open the missive and see that its contents were entirely loyal to the Government. At all events, the abuses of indiscriminate letter opening was paused and the sheriffs of the several counties were commissioned to carry mail, each transporting the letters for another county to the border between the two, where he was met by the sheriff of the adjoining county.

Three years later, or in 1717, a regular postal service was established between Maryland and Virginia. This was supposed to be part of a long route reaching from Massachusetts to Williamsburg, but the far distant was not handled altogether satisfactorily. Indeed, it was a very common practice for the carriers on the long routes to delay their starting until sufficient mail had accumulated to warrant their outlaying the expenditures necessary for the trip.

The Eastern Shore of Maryland and the State capital were brought into touch with one another in 1727, when a mail line was established which was scheduled to go once a fortnight in summer and once a month in winter. This route was a land one via New Castle.

Maryland developed her postal system very rapidly, and, according to one authority, the colony boasted 144 miles of post routes in 1748, while Pennsylvania had but 78 miles at that time.

The foot carrier and horse relay post gave place in 1765 to mail coaches, which were in many ways more satisfactory. In this same year a coach mail service was inaugurated between Baltimore and Philadelphia.

During the infant years of governmental postal service the charges for transporting letters and packages were regulated according to distance. Thus it was in England, until the uniform postal rate was established, the charges for carrying a letter of not more than prescribed rate was 4 pence for a distance not exceeding 15 miles. The prices were scaled up so that the charge for a distance of from 220 to 300 miles was 12 pence, while an additional penny was added for every 100 miles above that distance. There was also an extra charge of one-half penny for carrying a letter over the borders.

In Maryland the charges were based on somewhat the same rate. Thus it was that the cost of sending a letter from Baltimore to Philadelphia would be 9 pence, while the charge to New Castle—which was an important point in the affairs of Marylanders in those days—was 7 pence. These prices obtained in the earlier part of the eighteenth century, while in the years immediately preceeding the American Revolution the charge for carrying a single letter was calculated at 7½ cents for each 60 miles.

The mail was slow and insecure in those days, and even as late as 1829 the time allowed mailcarrying boats for making round trip over the Atlantic was 105 days. Yet on occasions comparatively good time was made. For example, the manner of sending the news of the engagements at Concord and Lexington, in the dawn of the struggle for independence, showed the American spirit of restless energy.

This news handled by regular posts, reached New Haven by 9.30 on the morning of April 24. At 2 P. M. of the following day it arrived in New York city; Elizabethtown, 7 P. M.; New Brunswick, 12 midnight; Princeton, 3 A. M. of the 26th; Trenton, 6.30 A. M.; Philadephia, 12 noon; Chester, 4 P. M.; New Castle, 9 P. M.; Baltimore, 10 P. M. of the following day, and Annapolis at 9.30 A. M. of the 28th.

This was one of the great accomplishments of the postal services in the days before the Revolution—from New York to Baltimore by traveling night and day in 56 hours. It is the dividing line between the Colonial and modern method of handling mail, for, although the service did not improve immediately after the successful struggle for independence of the colonies, it lost then much of its amateurish aspect.

Not every boy can be a rich man, great man, but every boy can be a gentleman. A boy with gentlemanly manners, who is trusty and honest and does his very best every day, will gain the attention and confidence of men and will be given paying and responsible positions as soon as he is old enough to fill them. Boys like to have fun and a good time. It is right they should. They will never be boys but once, but to have fun is not altogether what they were made for. Boys are of value chiefly to make men, good for something in the world. Character, like a house, must have the right kind of a foundation. The foundation stones of a good character are reverence for God, respect and obedience to parents, deference for old people.

The term printer's devil as applied to the boy who does the choring around a printing office has a peculiar romantic history. In early days printing was styled the "black art," and printers were supposed to be in league with Satan. But it was in the time of Aldus Minutius in Venice that the matter took a serious turn. This was the famous printer who first published the Greek and Roman classics. He took into his employ a negro boy who was homeless on the streets of Venice. The people supposed the boy was an imp from Satan and that he assisted in printing. Mobs collected about the office and were about to wreck it, when the boy was brought forward and exhibited showed that the boy was flesh and blood, but he was still called "the printer's devil" and every boy in his position ever since has been so called.

It is much easier to lead people than to drive them. We often hear it said that a person was "driven to destruction." As a rule this person was led to destruction. There are so many snares and pit-falls in the highway of life, and so many are lured to destruction by those who enjoy seeing others brought to their own level. The guide boards set up by our churches showing to the young "the straight and narrow way," is the only safe path.

Admiration alone will not run a newspaper. Sooner or later such admirers will find that the object of their affection has become wedded to other ways that they do not admire—in other words, a newspaper is compelled, in order to live, to seek the friendship of those who are not so platonic in their love, but unite their practical esteem with sentiment that blends mutual admiration in other professions. There are too many men who expect an editor to slave in defense of their pet notions and hobbies, advocate their views against the strongest opposition, and coolly withhold the business support by which alone a small newspaper can live.

Who wouldn't be a farmer? There is just one trouble, only the famers know how to farm. There are thousands who would like to quit the towns and cities and emigrate to the country, and possess themselves of broad fertile fields, and proceed to make two blades of this, that or the other of grass grow where one or none grew before, but this proposition presents, that it takes from two to twenty years to learn how to farm (some folks never learn), and within such a period bankruptcy might occur several times over. But if all of us cannot be farmers, all can admire the horny-handed sons of toil and rejoice with him in his present great prosperity. He is the bulwark of the nation and the salt of the earth.

Dear Sir: Josh Billings never said anything truer than this: "Sucksess duz not konsist ov never makin blunders, but in not makin the same wun twist."

N. R. Watkins, of Lott, Texas, had his house painted some years ago, and it took 13 gallons of what he believed to be paint; he bought it for paint, and it looked like paint, the painter said it was paint.

He has had it painted again; it took 7 gallons Devoe.

It cost $65 before; now $35.

He knows it is painted now, and he's got that $30 in a safe place. He's got his knowledge in a safe place too.

THREE DEAD IN SUNDAY WRECK

Runaway Freight Train Down Cranberry Grade to Destruction.

ENGINE AND TEN CARS DEMOLISHED

Lives of Engineer, Brakeman and Flagman Forfeited—Body of Engineer M. Fallon Recovered Monday Afternoon.

Tearing down the Cranberry Grade at the rate of a mile a minute, Sunday morning at 2:18 o'clock, an extra freight train drawn by engine No. 1847, with Engineer Martin Fallon at the trottle, plunged into the rear of fifth 97, drawn by engine No. 1871. Engine J. T. Gift, and Conductor J. H. Cornwell, and in an instant's time three lives were snuffed out. The dead are:

Engineer Martin Fallon of Piedmont, W. Va.

Flagman Jacot W. Gerlack of Cumberland, Md.

Brakeman W. E. Hamill of Keyser, W. Va.

The injured: Conductor J. H. Cornwell of Grafton; cut and bruises about the face and head; injuries not serious. The brakeman of the runaway engine, who was thrown a considerable distance, was but slightly bruised.

The story of the wreck as gleaned from one of the train crew of the runaway is about as follows: The extra had left the top of the grade at Terra Alta is good shape, having made the usual stop and inspection of air. The descent of the grade was begun in the usual manner, but before the Rodamer's tunnel was reached Engineer Fallon knew that something was wrong, and his efforts to stop the train failed. The air would not work properly. Soon the train was going at a terrific speed, and the engineer communicated to his fireman the fact that the train was running away and was beyond control. The speed grew greater as every mile was passed, and at every sharp curve it was feared by the train crew that the engine would jump the track and carry all to death. The fireman got out on the engine and clung to the sandbox, and the engineer remained in the cab, only hoping that he would have a clear track at Rowlesburg and his speed be stopped by the ascent of the grade leading upward from that point.

The brakemen on the runaway train did excellent duty. They set the handbrakes until the wheels were sliding in many instances, and fire flew from between the brakes and the wheels and from beneath the wheels and the rails. At the little station of McMillan, which is nothing more than a side-track, and when the runaway was at its highest speed, it plunged into the caboose of Conductor J. H. Cornwall's train, drawn by engine No. 1871. The caboose was smashed into splinters and several of the cars just ahead of it were wrecked. The runaway engine, together with twelve laden cars, jumped the track and plunged into the waters of Salt Lick, the stream that runs along the track for quite a distance and which empties into Cheat at the Rowlesburg bridge. Engineer Fallon went down with his train and was buried beneath the wreckage. Brakeman W. E. Hamill, also of the runaway train, was caught in the wreckage and killed. Flagman J. W. Gerlack of Conductor Cornwell's train, who had just left the caboose, was also caught and instantly killed. The fireman on the runaway, who was clinging to the sand-box on the top of the engine's boiler, believing this to be the best place of safety, was thrown a considerable distance when the engine plunged into the 97, but almost by a miracle escaped injury. He alighted in the creek at a point where the water was shallow.

When the runaway bore down upon his caboose, Conductor Cornwell had his head out of the window and did not know his train was in danger until the on-coming train struck. He was listening to hear his own engine blow for the signal at the tower just below McMillen, and his train was making at the time about twenty miles an hour. Conductor Cornwell was thrown out of the window, alighting between the tracks in an unconscious condition, and in which state he remained for about three hours. Dr. Proudfoot of Rowlesburg and Drs. Scott and Dailey of Terra Alta, were summoned and hurried to the scene as quickly as possible, doing everything possible for the wounded conductor and finally bringing him back to consciousness.

The fireman on the runaway train stated to some of his acquaintances at Rowlesburg that Engineer Fallon said to him several times that he feared they were "goners," and at one time the engineer got down on the step of the engine with the evident intention of jumping, but that meant certain death, and he returned to his cab, remaining there until the end came. When the runaway engine struck the caboose of 97 and cut through that and two cars ahead the shock threw on the emergency brake of the runaway train, and this in all probability saved the total wreckage of the extra. The cars wrecked were laden with coal and there was one car load of apples.

Promptly following the news of the disaster the wreck trains from both Cumberland and Grafton were sent to the scene. There are three tracks up the grade from Rowlesburg to Terra Alta, and because of this fact there was little delay in trains. All three of the tracks were blocked, but one of them was cleared in a very short time and the delay of through passenger trains amounted to but little. The dead engineer, Martin Fallon of Piedmoat, was aged forty years, and was an able employee of the company.

Flagman J. W. Gerlach, whose home was in Cumberland, was aged 30 years; he was married, and leaves a wife and two children.

Brakeman W. E. Hamill, residing at Keyser, was aged about twenty-four years, but whether married or not we have yet to learn. The bodies of the dead were taken to their homes.

BOWSER TAKES OUTING

While Wife Is Away He Joins Summer Boarder Colony.

SEEKS A SYLVAN RETREAT.

Instead He Finds a Mosquito Infested Place Dreary to the Last Degree. Starts a Row With Farmer and Throws Him Over a Fence.

[Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.]

Mrs. Bowser had received a letter from her mother stating that she was not very well and asking her to visit her for a week or so. She read the letter to Mr. Bowser and added that of course she could not leave him all alone for a week and would have to answer that she could not come, when he replied:

"There is nothing whatever in the way of your going and staying two or three weeks if you want to. In fact, I rather insist upon your going."

"But it would be awful lonesome for you here alone."

"I shan't be here alone."

"You could go to some boarding house, I know, but you wouldn't like it."

"I shall not go to any boarding house."

"Then what will you do?"

He took from his pocketbook an advertisement cut from a newspaper and made quite a show of reading:

"Summer boarders to the number of fifteen can be accommodated at the

"I TOOK IT THAT YOU BELONGED TO THE PURFESH."

Sundown farm, thirty miles from the city. All our own vegetables, butter and milk. Porches, swings and hammocks. Soft beds. No mosquitoes. Groves, meadows and brooks. Bring your bike. References required. Terms, $8 per week. Children taken. Short and beautiful walk from the railroad station."

"And you think of going out there?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

Wanted a Week's Rest.

"I not only think but I know I'm going. I was going to propose it to you, but you can go and see your mother and I'll go up to Sundown farm alone. I'd like to put in at least a week in the country in some quiet place."

"But you know how you are about things."

"What do you mean by that?" he demanded.

"Why, you will probably be disappointed and"—

"And I will raise a row? That shows how little you know me. I may not find things all I anticipate, but I shall say nothing. I am no hand to raise rows. No one ever heard me complain of anything. If I don't like this place I can find another. One would think I was a roaring lion to hear you talk. You just get ready and go your way and I'll go mine, and I'm sure I'll have the best time."

It was settled that way, though Mrs. Bowser had a hundred misgivings to one hope. Mr. Bowser figured out what he wanted to take, secured references from six different men, and before he finally got away he made more fuss than if the entire household goods were being removed to another house. There were times when he almost changed his mind and decided to go hunting elephants in Africa or mountain climbing in Montana, but he had only to read that advertisement over again to bring him back to Sundown farm and its meadows and brooks. When his corns ached he even thought of paddling his feet in those brooks.

Mrs. Bowser reached her mother's house without adventure. Mr. Bowser reached Sundown station to find that it consisted of a small building for the use of the agent, a shed for a freight house and a water tank. The agent was a young man with a lonesome look and a scarcity of talk. When asked if he knew the farm he pointed to a road leading across a swamp. When asked if Mr. Bowser's trunk could remain there until sent for he said nothing. When asked if he knew the farm and if the groves and eggs and butter were all right, he smiled sadly and crossed the tracks to unload a barrel of salt.

Mr. Bowser set out. He had somehow got it in his mind that a short walk meant a quarter of a mile at most. He had never looked the term up in Webster or he would have found it to mean, "A short walk in the country means anything from two to twenty miles." In this case it meant almost two miles. The road was mostly through the woods, and there were mosquitoes by the millions. There were frog ponds and swamps. He met one stray dog and one tramp who wasn't stray, but knew where he wanted to go. The dog took one look at Mr. Bowser's face and went past him on the run, expecting to be hit with a club. The tramp stopped him and said:

"Say, old cock, have you got a chew of tobacco about you?"

"No!" shouted Mr. Bowser.

Took Him For a Tramp.

"Well, you needn't knock any trees over with that voice of yours. I took it that you belonged to the purfesh and would share with a comrade, but I was mistaken. If I was you I'd chaw that face off myself!"

Mr. Bowser kept his dignity and passed on, though the temptation was great. Sundown farm finally came into view. That's one good thing about the country. If you walk long enough and far enough anything from a bull calf to a thousand acre farm will heave into view. There was a brook running across the road, but it ran silently. It wasn't paid to babble. There was a spotted cow standing in the shade of three trees—the groves mentioned in the ad. She was covered with flies, but she wasn't switching her tail. She had switched it for twenty years and had come to recognize the futility. There was a green meadow, but it belonged to the next farm. There was a porch to the unpainted old house, and on it sat two women, seven children and a cross eyed youth of sixteen. The cross eyed youth had brought his bike, as per ad. It leaned against the fence—what was left of it.

The owner of Sundown farm was at the gate to meet the new arrival. He was also cross eyed. That was why there was a bond of sympathy between him and the youth and why he had been holding him on his knee and telling him that nothing succeeds like success. He held out his hand and smiled a welcome.

"What sort of a place do you call this?" demanded Mr. Bowser as he refused the hand.

"It is Sundown farm, sir. Did you come on my advertisement?"

"Yes, I was just fool enough. By thunder, but you ought to be prosecuted for inserting such an ad. as that!"

"But what is wrong, sir—what is wrong?" asked the other as he drew himself up. "This place has been a favorite resort for the last five years, and you see the guests have already begun to arrive. There will be fifteen more this week. I can't understand your attitude, sir."

"Maybe it strikes him with terror," suggested the cross eyed youth, who had come down to the gate. "I know it did me when I first saw it. After being here one day the feeling of terror wore off."

Abuses the Farmer.

"It strikes me as being a blamed fraud!" exclaimed Mr. Bowser as he bristled up. "Look at your old house! Look at that drove of young uns! Look at that swamp down there! Look at this thundering big skeeter jabbing his pitchfork into me right here at noonday!"

"Sir, I trust that you brought references with you," replied the farmer.

"All guests must have references the first season," added the youth.

"References!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he almost jumped up and down. "You wait till I get back to town and I'll give you references by the bushel! I'll let the public know through the press what sort of a tramps' lodging house you have out here!"

"But the soft beds, sir," protested the farmer.

"And the vegetables, butter and eggs," added the youth.

Then the women and children left the porch and came down to the gate, and one of the women said to the owner of the favorite and justly popular resort:

"I hope you will be careful who you take in. I understand that many burglars are going around the country in disguise."

Mr. Bowser turned away for the 'short and beautiful' walk back to the station. The owner of Sundown started to accompany him and explain that the drinking water was right from a mountain spring and was warranted free from tadpoles, frogs, young alligators, coons and all foreign substances, but he had tried the summer boarder to the limit. Mr. Bowser grabbed him and threw him over his own fence into his own shady grove and then passed on without a look back. When he reached the station the lonesome looking agent looked at him, but said no word.

"Why in blazes didn't you tell me?" shouted Mr. Bowser.

The lonely looking agent took five minutes to think the question over and then answered:

"Because I wanted you to be lonesome too!" M. QUAD.

SILLIMAN INSTITUTE.

Work This College Is Doing for the Natives of Philippines.

Silliman Institute was founded in 1901 by Dr. H. B. Silliman of Cohoes, N. Y., with the purpose of creating in the Philippines a body of Christian men trained for the practical walks of life.

H. B. SILLIMAN.

From the door of the college building the islands of Cebu, Bohol Siquijor and Mindanao are clearly in view, and others lie just over the horizon. It was for this reason, and to keep the school away from the dangers of city life, that the town of Dumaguete on the island of Negros was chosen with its background of high mountains, and the Pacific only a stone's throw from the school door. It is in the center of the Visayan tribe of over 3,000,000 and within easy reach of them all. The site seems not to have been chosen amiss, for the people have taken the work of the school seriously from the start and have supported it loyally. The school, which is under the care of the foreign board of the Presbyterian church, was opened formally with 13 pupils, and in the five years of its existence has grown to 260. It would have been 300 if it had not been crowded to overflowing during the present year. These students come from all the larger islands of the archipelago, and are boys of enthusiasm and ability, for the most part from the Roman Catholic church, and yet too anxious for an education to allow this to stand in the way. It is the oldest of the Protestant Christian schools in the islands and the only one where rich and poor are brought together on terms of perfect equality, and given either a classical course or an industrial training.

It is a burning truth in the islands that knowledge is power; a boy goes home from the school here and can be a leader—a power almost from the start. In America it means a little envious concession, but here it means power — leadership. An educated, strong man, to-day, will move a whole community. The old Spanish system of education is as far out of date as a 40-year-old atlas. The new ideas of education, freedom and religion possess the heart and thought of the Filipino, says Dr. S. Hubbard in Record of Christian Work, and cannot be repressed. It is for the guidance of these that Silliman Institute stands—against superstition, injustice, slavery and ignorance. A careful study of the Bible as a text book is required of every student.

CLEANINGS.

Dr. C. Cuthbert Hall, president of Union seminary, New York, has returned to America, after delivering his second course of Barrow lectures in India. In different centers he found many who had heard his previous discourses, and his reception generally was most cordial.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, D. D., has been engaged by the Bible Teachers Training college of New York to give a special series of 14 lectures beginning Wednesday, March 18, 1908. Like the special series of lectures given this year by Dr. James Orr, they will be open to the public.

Rev. Robert Stuart McArthur, D. D., has completed his thirty-seventh year as pastor of Calvary Baptist church, New York. An interesting point in his career is that three hours after his graduation at Rochester Theological seminary he was on his way to New York to enter upon his duties as pastor of Calvary church.

The degree of doctor of medicine has been conferred upon Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, C. W. G., by the University of Oxford, causa honoris, in recognition of the splendid work he has achieved in improving the social condition of Labrador fisherfolk. The honor bestowed upon him by his old university is all the more marked by reason of its being the first honorary M. D. degree conferred at Oxford.

Education of Chinese Women.

Three scholarships for Chinese girls have been offered at Wellesley college, and the empress of China will select the girls. The Chinese government is now establishing schools for girls, but they are far from satisfactory in character. There are in Tientsin five girls' schools under government supervision with about 250 women and girls in attendance. So great is the need of women teachers that the viceroy of one of the provinces is about to open a woman's normal school.

Many Firsts.

Williams college, situated at Williamstown, Mass., was the first college to send out missionaries, the first to send out a scientific expedition, the first to issue a catalogue, the first to establish an astronomical observatory, the first to form an alumni association and the first to give its alumni a voice in its management, by the election of representatives upon the board of trustees.

LITTLE VISITS WITH "UNCLE BY"

Nutting.

Where the bushes dip over along the old trail,
I am speeding again with my basket and pail,
On my blue-denim shoulders, spread out at the back
With a knot in the front, is a brown gunny-sack,
Down the hard beaten pathway, I glide with a will
As I yell to my cronies who wait at the mill,
By the plum trees we halt for a succulent feast
And a fight with the pits, while the sun climbs the east.

Then again down the trail we are speeding once more
To the hick'ry nut grove by the stream's lapping shore.
Now we climb to the top with a pole, long and slim,
And we batter the nuts with a will, stern and grim,
But the best of it all is the lunch in the shade—
'Tis a feast of the gods by a boy's mother made,
With a cup from the spring, we are washing it down—
Just a ravenous bevy of boys, tanned and brown!

As the sun sinks to rest, we are back on the trail—
With a gait that is laggard, a pace that is snail,
On the woodshed next day, held aloft by a board,
I am gloating again o'er my Fall nutting hoard.
When the winter winds blow and the country is white,
I will bring out the nuts for the family at night,
While the fire in the grate is flame-tipped at its crest
And the company comes, I will crack with a zest.

And my mother will tell with a smile on her face
And a wave of her hand with its exquisite grace,
How I gathered the nuts when the weather was fine
And the trees were all red, in the Fall nutting time.

Past the vista of years I can see down the trail
To a lad who is speeding with basket and pail.
He is off to the woods, down the crooked old track—
'Round his blue-denim shirt is a sack on his back!

How my heart yearns to go with the freckled-faced band
Where the nuts grow again in a boy's fairyland.
Take me back, Father Time, for a day in the wold
Where the hick'ry nuts grow and the fox-squirrels scold.
Take me back to the feast 'neath the broad spreading tree,
Let me feel, ere I die, just a boy's ecstasy!
Let me be just a boy in the vari-hued clime
That I knew as a barefoot in hick'ry nut time!

TEMPERANCE

A TEMPERANCE SETTLEMENT.

What Lady Somerset Is Doing for the Women Drunkards.

Recently it was announced that Lady Henry Somerset had retired from public life, to devote herself to rescue work among erring and inebriate women in the settlement at Duxhurst, England. It is now a decade since the Duxhurst home was started, the pioneer establishment of its kind. It has grown and developed, proving the wisdom of its promoters, who held that the needs of the individual must be recognized by special care and separate housing provisions; that the personal, friendly example, which is the salient feature of Christ's ministry, must be the guiding principle; and that the crushed, weak and tempted can only be helped as they are led. It is in the spirit of this conviction that she has now gone to Duxhurst, there to spend the remainder of her good and useful life. On August 3 she reached the vantage point of 55 years. She has been the guiding spirit of Duxhurst from the beginning. It was she who conceived and brought into existence the attractive cottage colony on the sunny and sweet-scented slopes of Surrey, which has been an object-lesson in correct treatment for women who are slaves of the drink habit, and which has served to bring about needed and better legislation for the women drunkards of Great Britain and other countries.

It is easily seen that the most important feature of the Duxhurst colony is the novel and wise arrangement for the recognition of the individual. By assigning the women to cottages of six occupants, in charge of a nurse sister, the harm of contact with others similarly afflicted is greatly decreased. A healthy home atmosphere is created and each individual can be more readily reached with helpful influences. The cottages are simply furnished with just such equipment as every self-respecting laborer ought to have at home—clean, dainty, and pretty. The women take great pride in what they call "our little homes;" and they return to their own domiciles with a new mental image as to what a home should be like.

They are given active employment and industrial training. They take part in the various industries which have been started on the estate, such as the care of poultry, beekeeping, dairy work, flower-culture, jam-making and a certain amount of laundry and needle-work. Pleasant outdoor exercise and occupation is found to be the best restorative for weakened nerves and wills. The indoor occupations include basket-making, by which a good supply of baskets is produced for home use and for sale; seed-sorting, which provides a profitable winter occupation. Much attention is given to weaving and knitting, the products being dress-materials, huckaback towels, tablecloths, etc., all of which find a market and help to support the enterprise.

It is required that each patient shall have a guarantee of five shillings ($1.25) a week before entering; but if she is able to earn enough to pay her expenses through the week, anything over that is placed to her credit and at the end of her stay in the home is handed back to her in the form of wages. The cost of maintenance considerably exceeds the receipts from the patients, reaching as high as $20,000 in a single year, while the income is about $10,000. Nearly 14,000 pounds, or about $70,000, is the investment at Duxhurst, the last remaining sum having been collected as a surprise gift fund for Lady Henry Somerset, on her birthday, by the British Women's Temperance association.

Lady Henry Somerset, says the Christian Herald, goes about at Duxhurst from cottage to cottage, visiting with and speaking loving words of personal spiritual help and encouragement to the inmates, who regard her as a veritable angel of mercy. She lives in a centrally located little cottage, simply furnished like the rest; and her usual attire is that of the nurse, full skirt, apron, cap and kerchief.

Times Have Changed.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, said in a recent interview: "Fifteen or 20 years ago the common meeting place of a labor union would be a saloon or the room adjoining a saloon, but we changed all that. I would not say that it is now never done, but the whole influence of the federation is given against it. It was not good for the men. It was not good for the unions. There was more likelihood of violent talk and unwise measures. It hurt the standing of the unions in the community. Hence that is practically done away with."

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Heroin probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Does Love Spoil Men's Work?

By HALL CAINE, Novelist and Playwright

THE question whether or not love spoils a man's career all depends upon THE WOMAN.

If she be the WRONG WOMAN, he is like the man whose boat has sprung a leak—half the time that ought to be spent in making way is spent in baling out. If she be the right woman, she is so much EXTRA SAIL.

In the majority of cases of successful careers that have come within my own observation the wife has been extra sail.

One sees, of course, the obvious advantages of celibacy to pioneers like Cecil Rhodes, as well as to men who carry their lives in their hands, and should think of nothing but WORK AND DUTY. In the hour of peril having wife and children is apt to make a coward of a man.

Few men are called to the exercise of such a tragic choice, and to the greater number a brave woman by a man's side is an ADDED STRENGTH.

The marriages of literary men have often been unhappy. The SELFISH ABSORPTION required by the literary calling is not generally helpful to domestic life. The same might be said of the marriage of painters, and still more of actors, where the same conditions apply. But against the Byrons, the Shelleys, the Coleridges, the Dickenses, the Lyttons, you may very well set THE BROWNINGS, the Southeys, the Scotts, the Wordsworths and the Tennysons.

It is obvious that some of the happiest marriages of literary men have not been to LITERARY WOMEN, but to the sweet and simple souls who were "not all too good for human nature's daily food."

Coming to humbler conditions of life, I should say that marriage among work people generally unsettles the woman.

SHE BECOMES A WORSE SERVANT, BUT THE MAN BECOMES A BETTER SERVANT, FOR THE ADDED SENSE OF PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY WITH THE COMING OF WIFE AND CHILDREN MAKES A MAN MORE CAREFUL OF HIS DUTY AND MORE ANXIOUS TO KEEP HIS PLACE.

Alcoholism Is Only A Form of Insanity

By Dr. T. D. CROTHERS of Hartford, Conn.

THE term "inebriety" describes a condition which calls for alcohol for its anaesthetic effect and in reality means a disease or DISORDER OF THE BRAIN, for which alcohol is a most grateful remedy.

The use of alcohol is in most cases a symptom of some disorder and not, as supposed, the cause. The theory that the excessive use of spirits is a vice and MORAL CONDITION is not true. Great injustice and wrongs follow the efforts to correct this evil based on these false theories. A scientific study of inebriety indicates a definite disease, with distinct causes, progress and termination, THE SAME AS OTHER DISEASES.

Two marked symptoms of insanity are prominent. One is in the periodic drinker, who drinks to excess for a short period, then abstains. This drink period is practically an acute mania or INSANE IMPULSE, which resists all efforts of control. It is often preceded by insomnia, headaches and great irritability. Such persons drink both secretly and openly and act like insane persons. It resembles epilepsy in its sudden convulsive onset and inability to break up or control except by the harshest measures.

Cases have been noted where persons drank for two or more months, then abstained for five years, relapsing again as before. Another large class of patients are secret midnight drinkers WHO NEVER DRINK AT ANY OTHER TIME.

Certain atmospheric and electrical conditions seem to be active in precipitating the drink attacks. One man only drinks at the seashore, another on high elevations. One drinks in certain climates and seasons of the year and at no other time. Many persons drink heavily in large cities and are strict abstainers elsewhere.

Another form of insanity is seen in the constant drinker who daily drinks in so called moderation, and because he is not incapacitated or seems not to be changed in feeling or degree of comfort believes that he is benefited. Measurements by instruments of precision and careful studies of persons who drink regularly, EVEN IN SO CALLED SMALL QUANTITIES, indicate that they are the most degenerate and defective of all inebriates and the most positively insane in a GENERAL sense.

ACCURATE STUDIES AND MEASUREMENTS SHOW THAT THE STEADY DRINKER HAS ALWAYS DELUSIONS AND HALLUCINATIONS, WITH DEGREES OF DEMENTIA, WHICH HE COVERS UP AND CAN ONLY BE SEEN BY HIS INTIMATE FRIENDS AND ASSOCIATES. ALL SUCH PERSONS SUFFER FROM CHRONIC POISON AND STARVATION.

The Temptation of "Getting"

By Rev. FRANCIS L. PATTON, President Princeton Theological Seminary

TO the poor man I say, "You poor man, you sell your muscle, you eat the bread of toil, ONLY TO BE DESPISED by those more prosperous."

And to the rich man I say: "Are YOU any better? You have bought and sold, your strong box is stuffed with securities, yours is the first fruit of the FARMERS' PRODUCE, you travel across the country in your private car, but death comes. Death is a flood that overawes you both, and you both must seek refuge in eternal life, the character of which is determined by your conduct HERE."

IT IS BETTER TO BE THAN TO HAVE. But many of us think the opposite. We go through college and we say these professional attainments must bring us something, and we start in to get.

STATE AID FOR OUR PUBLIC ROADS.

Geogical Survey Reports Great Half-Year's Progress.

AGRICULTURAL SOILS STUDIED.

System of Wardens Established To Guard Against Forest Fires—Timber Seedlings For Farmers.

The semiannual meetings of the State Geological Survey and State Forestry Boards were held Friday afternoon at the offices of the Maryland Geological Survey at the Johns Hopkins University. All the members of the State Geoligical Survey Board, which includes Governor Warfield, Comptroller Atkinson, President Remsen, of the Johns Hopkins University, and President Silvester, of the Maryland Agricultural College, are ex officio members of the State Forestry Board, which also includes Prof. William Bullock Clark, State Geologist; ex-Gov. E. E. Jackson and Mr. Norman James.

Professor Clark, chief of the Geological Survey, presented an account of the survey's work during the last half year. The new road map of the State in three sheets, and new maps of three counties—Baltimore, Anne Arundel and Dorchester—all of which are in press, were submitted to the board. On the State map, which is on the scale of three miles to the inch, the leading roads and streams are shown together with all cities, towns and villages. It has been compiled and edited by Prof. Edward B. Mathews, Assistant State Geologist.

With the close of this season's field work about seven-eighths of the State will have been surveyed for the base topographic map on which is platted the distribution of the geological formations, agricultural soils and forest growth. Somewhat more than one-half of the State has already been surveyed geologically, while a little more than one-third of the agricultural soils of the State have been determined and the results platted on the base map.

The report on the highway work of the survey was presented by Chief Engineor Crosby, who said:

Up to date applications for State aid have been received for more than 250 miles of road, and 191 miles have been surveyed. Plans have been made for 148 miles, and estimates amounting to $937,000 have been sent to the counties as the probable cost of these improvements. Contracts have been approved for 86 sections of road, totaling 88 miles and calling for an expenditure of about $500,000. More than one-half of this work has been completed up to October 1, and 54 sections, amounting to 41 miles, the total cost of which was $257,211.06, have been accepted and settled for. It is hoped that at least 30 more miles of road may be fully completed by the end of the present season.

"In addition to the above has been the work on the Baltimore-Washington road. Between 12 and 13 miles of this road have been graded and drained, and about eight miles of macadam practically completed. The work is still going and will be pushed as long and as rapidly as weather conditions will permit."

Mr. F. W. Besley, the State Forester, gave a report on the summer's work in forestry. He said that the educational feature of the work, with true forestry endeavor as new as it is in this State, must be an important one. He reported that during the summer several lectures and addresses on forestry had been given before various organizations. The way in which these addresses were received indicated a lively interest in the subject and had helped to broaden the work. Articles in the newspapers aud magazines were published and reached a wide circle of readers.

At the present time there are 42 forest wardens in the timber counties, whose duty it is to look out for forest fires and to assist in gathering information concerning the forest resources of the counties.

The state Forester has made several wood-lot examinations for private owners during the summer, and in each case a forest-working plan was prepared. Early in the spring a forest nursery was established at the State Agricultural Experiment Station for the purpose of growing forest-tree seedlings to distribute among the farmers of the State.

SLAVERY OF THE AGES.

No Freedom for Old Men and Women Without Independent Means.

That another society is urgently needed in New York City is the opinion of more than one person who has looked into the matter. There are societies for the protection of children, horses, cats and dogs, of soldiers and sailors, of immigrants, of cattle in transit, etc., etc., but there is no society for the protection of old people from the thoughtlessness and want of patience on the part of the young.

"My heart," said a middle aged woman, the other day, "goes out to the countless old women and men who already have, as the world thinks, pretty good homes, but who for all the freedom or joy that is theirs might as well live in a dungeon. Haven't you seen them?—nominally given a home by a son or daughter, but unintentionally it may be and quite unconsciously, made to feel superfluous, snubbed and sat on at every turn. I think a lot of it comes from the tendency of the modern mother to give her children unlimited liberty. Her children must not be interfered with in the slightest degree, even by her own mother or her husband's mother. I visit in one such household. The old aunt who lives there brought up her nephew, the father of the household—was his second mother. She has always spent herself for others. Perhaps she is getting a bit fussy now. But it is pathetic, all the same, to see how she is perpetually quenched by her brisk young niece-in-law.

"'Never mind, auntie; don't worry the children. . . . Don't bother, auntie; that isn't the way I want it done. . . . Now, auntie, the children are all right; don't interfere with them.' . . . And then in an undertone, 'Oh, why can't auntie sit down quietly and leave things alone?' The children take their tone from the mother, of course. I never go there but I say to myself that, come what will, I shall have a little home of my own when I am old."

"I believe," said another woman who had been taking notes on the subject, "it is not exaggerating to say that the majority of old people who live with their children are not happy. There is a great deal of sentiment over the mother question, and honoring gray hairs, and all that. Any vaudeville singer can make people weep by singing 'Home and Mother,' but as a matter of fact there is a great lack of respect in America for the aged—the dependent aged. In one home I know, and it's not an unusual case, the old parents, who live with their son and are supported by him, never appear when there are guests at dinner. They don't want to, you say? Nonesense! They are not wanted. They are kept in the background. They are a little queer, no doubt. They are old-fashioned, and their grammar is a bit off sometimes, and grandmother uses an ear trumpet, and grandfather is attached to his pipe. What then? Is that any reason why they should be made to dine by themselves, in a little back room, when there are guests? If they are not as cultivated as their children are it is because they worked so hard for those children when they were young. If they are dependent on their son, it is because they spent their sub stance giving that son the advantages he demanded. And now it's 'Oh, well, mother's so fussy, you know,' and 'Poor old father! I wonder if all the old people get like that?'

"Ask yourself in how many families where lives an old grandfather or grandmother are the children taught to show the old person the respect, the deference, which is the due of age? The children love grandfather and grandmother—oh, of course—but Young America will brook no interference from the past generation."

"Do you recollect," asked a man who was old himself, "that story of Jack London's about the old Indian up in Alaska who was left behind in the snow by his own son and the tribe—left with a little fire to meet his death from the cold and the wolves because he was too old to hunt? It was a tribal custom, and I sometimes think that we who call ourselves civilized are no less cruel. My wife and I, I am happy to say, have saved enough to maintain our own home, and we steadfastly resist our children's appeals to 'break up and live with us.' It isn't that we doubt their love, but I want a place where I can leave my pipe around as I choose, and mother, who is active still, wants to fuss around and do things without having a daughter-in-law at her elbow constantly with, 'There, mother, don't bother; we'll do that.'

"We are luckier than an old friend of ours, a woman of seventy-five, whose son took legal steps to prove that she was unfit to care for her property. He succeeded in convincing the court that it was so, though in fact she was entirely competent. Her property was turned over to her son, and she was obliged to go and live with him and his young wife, giving up the home she had made for herself.

"Some English author—I've forgotten which one—remarks somewhere that it's strange that a man cares a thousand times more for the babe who would forget him in a day than for the parents who have worked all their lives for them. It is nature, I suppose, and I dare say we were all that way, but there are some old persons on whom it seems a trifle hard."

"Dr. Osler was right when he said there was no place in the world for persons who are over sixty," said a man ten years beyond that mark. "There is certainly little place for them in the world of work or business; it is the young, strong men and women who are wanted. And frequently there is little place for us in the home, unless we make one of our own. My grievance against my daughter, with whom I live, is that she's too good to me. If I go out to chop kindlings in the back yard, it's 'Father, don't do that; the neighbors will think it so queer, and you'll make yourself ill.' As if I, a man of seventy, didn't know what was good for me! My daughrar loves me—oh, yes—but I want to be independent.'"

It would be a difficu't matter for any society to touch, of course. One woman who has thought a good deal about it says there ought to be a fund from which to endow every old person without means—except those who have been idle and wasteful—with enough to live in decent independence. Others say there ought to be clubs and leagues to inculcate respect for the aged in the minds of the young. One waman suggests that this country import a few Chinese to teach the art.

GREAT ADVANCE IN STATE FOREST WORK

Department Of Agriculture Reviews Progress In Various States.

"Forest work carried on by the States made greater advance during 1906 than in any previous year" is the encouraging report of the Forest Service in reviewing the principal achievements of the year in forestry for the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture. "More than 20 States now have forest officers, and 10 have State forest reservations. In 5 States—Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Michigan and Wisconsin—the removal of mature timber from State forest lands is now permitted, a provision which is a fundamental principle of forestry.

"The Delaware State Experimental Station, in cooperation with the Forest Service, has made a study of forest conditions on which to base recommendations for a State forest policy and plans of management for different stands of timber and different classes of land.

"On July 1 a forester was appointed by the newly created Maryland board of forestry. A portion of the autumn was spent in making a reconnaissance of the forest lands of the State.

"A State fire warden and 70 township wardens have been appointed in New Jersey under the law which became effective July 1, 1906. The fall season was remarkably exempt from serious fires. At the beginning of the year 1907 a State forester was appointed, who will give assistance to private landowners, give course of instruction to teachers, and cooperate with the State fire warden and with the Forest Park Reservation Commission.

"Within the boundary of the Catskill Preserve in New York there are 92,708 acres of State lands and 483,412 acres privately owned; the total area of the Adirondack Preserve is 3,313,564 acres, of which the State now owns 1,347,280 acres.

"Under the law of 1905 the superintendent of forests was able to patrol the State preserves efficiently during the dry season at small expense. To supply stock for planting in the preserves the State maintains 3 large nurseries for conifers in Franklin County and 1 for hardwoods in Ulster County, in the Catskill. The three Adirondack nurseries combined have a capacity of a million 3-year-old transplants per annum. One of these, the Saranac Inn Nursery, established by the State in 1903 and the others, Axton and Wawbeek, were first established by the Cornell College of Forestry and were placed in charge of the State forest commission in the spring of 1906. Five plantations, embracing an area of 1,500 acres, have been planted. In 1905 and 1906, 50 acres of pines and spruces were planted by the seed-spot method with encouraging results. Broadcast sowing last March of white pine, red spruce, and balsam was not satisfactory. An interesting experiment is being conducted with 5 pecies of Siberian conifers—pines, fir, and larch—to determine their fitness for planting in the North Woods.

"The State nurseries of Pennsylvania were doubled in size in 1906 and now comprise 6 acres at Mont Alto, the location of the State forestry academy, 3 acres in Tioga County, and 3 acres in Huntingdon County. Last spring 160,000 white pine seedlings were set out, and 400 pounds of white pine seed is to be planted this spring. For the two years beginning June 1, 1907, the legislature appropriated $600,000 for the purchase of forest lands, and $25,000 for the examination of the titles to lands purchased; $80,000 for the road and school fund in townships having reserved lands; $182,000 for work upon the reservations, and $40,000 as the State's two-thirds share of the cost of extinguishing forest fires through out the State. The Pennsylvania is the first railroad company to appoint a forester to supervise the care and planting of forest lands. Already 500,000 trees have been planted, and 681 acres of land near Altoona, Pa., will be stocked with chestnut and white oak in the next two years. The Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company will plant 378 acres in Carbon and Schuylkill counties, Pa., with chestnut, European larch, and Scotch pine. The Delaware and Hudson Company was led by the results of a cooperative study with the Forest Service to appoint a forester to look after the extensive woodlands, of the company and attend to the planting work. The Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company has been investigating how mine props may be made to last longer through impregnation with creosote by the 'open-tank' treatment. The results of this treatment are so satisfactory that plans have been made for the erection of a plant, with a capacity of about 800 cubic feet a day, with which to continue the treatment on a commercial scale. This has shown the economy of the open-tank treatment and encouraged its wider use."

FORAKER ON TARIFF REVISION.

Ohio Senator Has Comprehensive Grasp of Situation.

In his speech of July 19 at Miamisburg, Senator Foraker occupied a plane of high intelligence and sound common sense when he said, in reference to the proposed revision of the tariff:

"It might be that a more satisfactory tariff law would be made than that which we now have, but I doubt it. It may be that our general situation would be improved, but I do not see how it is possible. With respect to such procedure only one thing is certain, and that is that we would have a period of suspense, of doubt and of uncertainty, that would work a more or less serious interruption to business."

That is the view entertained by the best business minds of the country. Those who have watched the making and the unmaking of tariffs know from experience what the process involves in the shape of prolonged discussion and attempts to harmonize conflicting views. Senator Foraker knows this, for he has had much to do with tariff legislation in the past 20 years. He realizes the wisdom of the remark of the late Thomas B. Reed that it is very easy to revise a tariff—in your mind, but far from easy when it comes to a final legislative procedure. Mr. Foraker is right in demanding that those who clamor for a change shall show that they know what they are clamoring for:

"I want some man who is clamoring for an immediate revision to tell me what evil is so great it can no longer be endured; what duties are to be changed and what improvement in the situation is to follow. Let us have a bill of particulars."

No man among the many who have spoken and written for immediate tariff disturbance has answered any of these questions. No man has yet furnished a bill of particulars. As Mr. Foraker so forcibly puts it, no one has asked the farmers whether and in what way they want the duties changed. No one has asked this question of the sugar growers, the tobacco growers, the rice growers, the mill owners, the pottery men, the glass men and those whom they employ. Ten million voters who work on farms and in factories have not been asked to state wherein the present tariff is working badly and ought to be changed.

Senator Foraker's plea is for a square deal in this matter of tariff revision. He wants to know what is intended and for what reason. He does not want to go blindfolded into the business of tariff disturbance. He does not want the tariff ripped up "on general principles." That is the attitude of conservative men in business and in politics. They want to be shown. It is the attitude of all "stand-patters." They want to know what the great gains are to be that shall overbalance the absolutely certain losses through uncertainty, alarm and lack of confidence. They do not say that the tariff should never be revised, but they do insist that the need for revision has not been made apparent and that the time for revision has not yet arrived. Their position would seem to be natural, reasonable, logical.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1907. NUMBER 37

W REPUBLICANS WERE DEFRAUDED.

Democrats Used Money to Falsify the Count—Crother's Title Clouded.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 11.—Now that the smoke of battle has cleared away it is easy enough for Republican leaders to explain the cause of the party's defeat. Based on information received prior to the election the leaders had every reason to feel sanguine of success and, had the parties met on even terms, every expectation would have been realized. They have since learned that the odds were against them, not in numbers, for numerically they were very much the stronger, but in the possession of the party machinery and the sinews of war.

The Democrats had a decided advantage in having control and they used it to the limit. The supervisors of election in the counties worked the ballot in the interest of their party and succeeded in disfranchising hundreds of Republicans. This in itself was a level that should have lifted the Democrats into power. But in addition they were plentifully supplied with money and the combination was too strong to be overcome.

It is not known from whom the Democrats obtained their sinews of war, but that they used them, and used them effectively, is known. In Baltimore city alone they spent on the day of election anywhere from twenty to thirty thousand dollars. There are some who estimate the amount disbursed at an even higher figure. It was stated by one of the organization leaders on the day after that they had more money than they needed, and this, too, after giving to each of the 317 precinct execurives $50. As much again was probably spent for what is known as practical work, and it was this work that did the business.

The Republicans, on the other hand, had barely sufficient to man the polls after 6 o'clock so as to protect themselves. They were obliged to rely upon one set of watchers, a majority of whom undoubtedly stuck to their self-imposed task to the end, while the rest, tired and inexperienced, sought their beds when they had enough. It is hardly fair to blame some of these men, who could not afford to sacrifice their positions by remaining away the following day or to work without having slept. The precinct men received at from $15 to $20, and nothing remained after this was given out for other purposes. The Democrats made sure of their watchers in the wards in which they were needed. Not only were the regular men paid for their services, but they were not all required to remain to the end, fresh men replacing those who had been on duty from 6 o'clock until midnight.

The counties in the state were similarly well supplied. In addition to the amounts distributed by Chairman Vandiver, the local officeholders contributed liberally. The chairman, as usual, pleaded poverty, but he had no cause to complain. The individual subscriptions to John Walter Smith and A. P. Gorman were alone sufficient to meet the running expenses. The Republicans in every county in the state report the Democrats had more money than they could use. Their campaign fund is variously estimated at from eighty to one hundred thousand dollars.

On the day after the election Chairman Parran confided to a friend that the total amount at his disposal with which to make the fight was $15,000, and out of that he was expected to finance the campaign in every county in the state. "It was all I had," said he, "and all I could get, and with it I made the best fight possible. I was absolutely confident of Gaither's election, believing as I did he had a clear majority in the state, but with the election machinery working against us, by means of which the ballot could be manipulated, and a barrel of money placed where it did us the most harm, the Democrats had an advantage which enabled them to secure a majority on the face of the returns.

At local Republican headquarters the leaders discussed the ways and means by which the Democrats succeeded in getting in their fine work, and it was generally agreed that it was done "in the window." Votes were thrown out that should have been counted, and others went into the box when they should have been thrown aside. The former were as a rule Republican votes, the latter always Democratic ballots. Then again, the count. If it were possible to recount the ballots it would be found that not only the governor but many of the local candidates returned as elected have no claims to their offices. They were really defeated.

The party leaders realize the uselessness of a contest, as the law is so hedged in that a recount is out of the question; hence they are obliged to accept the result as final and console with the reflection that a day of reckoning must came. What they can do, however, is to insist upon a new deal when the judges of election are appointed next year. The undersirable officials should be weeded out and replaced by men who can withstand temptation. There are enough Republicans in the city from among whom proper selections can be made. While only loyal party men should be placed on guard, they should be also honest and incorruptible. A large majority of the incumbents are above suspicion. Indeed, some are too honorable to hold their own against slick Democratic judges. This applies particularly to those who serve in Democratic wards in North and Northwest Baltimore.

Had every election official performed his duty, Gaither, instead of losing the city by 4,000 would have carried it anywhere from 5,000 to 6,000. He lost it by fraud, and the commission of Judge Crothers is, therefore, a tainted one, and as the same methods helped to return a Democratic legislature ex-Governor John Walter Smith's title to the United States senatorship must be similarly tainted.

There are in Maryland in round figures 270,000 registered voters. The number of stay-at-homes is estimated 15 per cent., which would make the number who actually voted 230,000. There were returned, as counted, about 200,000 ballots, leaving 30,000 to the bad. Of these 20,000 at least were Republicans, and there are Republicans who believe fully three-fourths of the disfranchised belonged to their party. But even at two-thirds they had a clear majority in the state of 10,000, and this, too, without considering the count which can at best be characterized as "crooked."

It is clear why the Democrats in the rural counties agreed so promptly to refrain from bribing the voters. Heretofore they have always declined to entertain such a proposition, and the very fact that they accepted it so promptly excited some suspicion. The explanation has since been made by a prominent politician: "We obtained better results at much less expense," said he, "by using the money on the inside instead of outside the polling-room. The buying of votes is a pretty costly business, and then we are not altogether certain of the goods being delivered. It's a showdown on the inside, and that, too, at one-twentieth the expense."

Evidently the same sort of game was played here, where there was no anti-bribery agreement. In certain wards colored men were paid not to vote, but otherwise there was no occasion to make outside purchases. These negroes who sold their franchise at the rate of $2 per vote may never have another opportunity to get money that way. If the Democrats succeed in pushing through their disfranchising scheme in the next legislature and then so change the election law as to enable them to win two years hence without expending as much as a penny, the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States will be a dead letter in Maryland, as it is already in other states in the South.

The Republicans will be in a hopeless minority in the next General Assembly. They can protest and vote, but that is about all they can do with only 9 representatives in the Senate and about 29 in the House. The Democrats, with their sweeping majorities, can accomplish pretty much what they want.

The newly elected officials will probably get busy as soon as they enter upon their duties, especially in the offices of the clerks of the Superior and Circuit Courts and in the sheriff's office. About 110 Republicans will be obliged to seek employment elsewhere. Clerk Ogle has in his department 85, Clerk Robinson 8 and Sheriff Padgett 15. Every one of these are to be invited to walk the plank and make room for a Democrat.

Every department, state as well as municipal, will be controlled by Democrats. It is the first time since 1895 that the Republicans have no foothold. They have also lost in the counties, the only gain being recorded on the Eastern Shore, where Collector Goldsborough carried Dorchester in spite of strenuous opposition and for the first time the Republicans are in full control of the county.

The defeat of General Wilmer for chief judge of the seventh judicial circuit was a surprise. The counties in the circuit are all Republican and were expected to give him a good majority. Charles alone stood by him, and here it was thought he would have the most trouble. The general's defeat is a great disappointment to Congressman Mudd who worked hard for his nomination and his election.

There is some talk of contesting the election of Mr. David E. Dick as a member of the House from Allegany on the grounds that he was not eligible, being a non-resident under the law. It is not likely that such a contest will be entertained by the House.

JUDGE M'COMAS DIES AT HOME IN WASHINGTON

Although Ill For Sometime His Death Came as a Great Shock

HE WAS A STATESMEN AND JURIST

In Congress Was Leader of His Party and Man of National Reputation—Attained a High Mark as Associate Judge of The Court of Appeals.

Judge Louis Emory McComas, former member of Congress from the Sixth Maryland District and former United States Senator from Maryland, contemporaneous with Hon. George L. Wellington, died suddenly Sunday morning at 3 o'clock, at his home 2601 Wyoming avenue, Washington, D. C., from heart trouble. He was stricken about 2:30 o'clock. He and Mrs. McComas and a servant were the only occupants of the house. Mrs. McComas summoned a physician. When he arrived Judge McComas had expired. Judge McComas had been in ill health for some time. He was married in the summer and on October 16 returned from his honeymoon spent in Europe. While abroad he was ill, but he was in a fair state of health when he returned home. Last Tuesday he was in Hagerstown. He retained his legal residence at Springfield, Williamsport district, Washington county, and he voted at Williamsport last Tuesday. He appeared in good health except that he had lost considerable flesh and his look was somewhat wan.

Judge McComas upon his return from Europe had taken his Washington residence for the winter with the view to resuming his duties as associate judge of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Judge McComas is survived by his second wife and one daughter, Mrs. C. Goodloe Edgar, of Detroit, Mich. His first wife was a daughter of the late C. W. Humrichouse, of Williamsport, Md.

The remains of Judge McComas were interred in Rose Hill cemetery, Hagerstown, Tuesday afternoon. The funeral party reached Hagerstown from Washington in a special car over the Baltimore and Ohio railroad on Tuesday noon. Services were held at St. John's Episcopal church, Hagerstown, at 2 o'clock, Tuesday afternoon. Rev. Joseph P. McComas, rector of St. Ann's Episcopal church, Annapolis, a nephew of Judge McComas, officiated.

The news of the death of Judge McComas produced a distinct shock. He was known personally by hundreds in Oakland and Garrett county and during his Congressional career, he had many warm followers. He was especially popular in the mining region. During the memorable tariff fights in Congress he was always in the forefront in the cause of protection and his special charge was the keeping of tariff on coal. He was easily one of the leading lights in Congress. As a debater, he was skillful and effective. He achieved the honor of having a pension bill passed by a large vote over the veto of President Cleveland, despite the House was heavily Democratic. It was the celebrated case of Joseph Romiser, of Cumberland.

Judge McComas was born on the Downs farm in Washington county, on October 28, 1846. He was a son of Frederick C. and Catherine (Angle) McComas. He was a brother of the late Frederick W. McComas, of the Hagerstown bar. His only surviving brother is Henry A. McComas, of Hagerstown. Judge McComas attended St. James College, Washington county.

He graduated from Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1866. He was married September 23, 1875, to Leah M. Humrichouse. He was admitted to the Washington county bar in 1878. Judge McComas entered politics at an early age. In 1876 when 30 years of age, he was defeated for Congress by William Walsh, of Cumberland. In 1882, he was elected to Congress over the late Montgomery Blair, of Montgomery county, who was postmaster-general in Lincoln's cabinet. He was re-elected in 1884 over the late Frederick J. Nelson, of Frederick. In 1886 he defeated the late Col. L. Victor Baughman, of Frederick. In 1888 he was elected for a fourth term, the late Gen. H. Kyd Douglas, of Hagerstown having been his opponent. He tried for a fifth term in 1890, but was defeated by the late Gen. William M. McKaig, of Cumberland.

Upon his defeat by Gen. McKaig, Judge McComas resumed the practice of law at Hagerstown. He continued active in politics, however, but soon received an appointment by President Harrison as judge on the District of Columbia bench. He retained the judgeship until the Maryland legislature made him United States senator, succeeding the late Arthur P. Gorman. He was elected senator at the session of 1898. His term expired in 1905, when President Roosevelt appointed him to the Supreme Bench of the District of Columbia. When he served first as judge on the District Bench, Judge McComas was professor of law of evidence and contracts Georgetown University Law School. While a member of the United States senate Judge McComas had an office in Baltimore, and Mr. George R. Gaither, late Republican candidate for governor, was associated with him in a law partnership.

Secret service men are working on the disappearance of a mail pouch which was lost or stolen from the mail wagon between Sommerfield and Brandonville. The pouch is said to have contained $1,200 in money and checks. It was in charge of Arley Adey when it disappeared. It is said that there is more or less mystery connected with the affair. Adey had a woman with him and neither of them can shed any light on the affair. Newton Adey, father of the carrier, is the contractor on the route. Rumor has it that a different face may be put on the affair when the government officers make their report.

FOR A SOLDIERS' MONUMENT

Suggested That Memorial Be Erected At New Court House.

To the Editor of The Republican:

In the dark days of 1861-65 many of the young men of our county left home and loved ones and went to the front to fight for our country, offered their lives if necessary that not one star should be torn from "Old Glory," one state from the Union, to fight and die that this "Government of the people, for the people, and by the people" should not be blotted from the earth.

Some of them never returned. Others came back crippled or shattered in health. A more noble band never followed their Country's Flag or charged their country's foe. Since those days the most of them have answered the last "roll call" and have joined the silent majority in the great beyond, and soon there will be none left of those noble heroes who did so much for our country and for us.

In most of the ounty eseat towns of the west and in many of the county towns of the east the people have built monuments in honor of our country's defenders.

In our county, as far as we know, there is but one memorial or monument erected in honor of the brave men who sacrificed so much to preserve the union, and that is a window in the Methodist Episcopal church in Swanton.

We are soon to have a fine court house in Oakland, which will be a credit to our county. Suppose we erect a nice monument in front of that Court House in honor of the soldiers of the Civil and the Spanish-American Wars.

Will not The Republicans take this matter up and help create public sentiment in favor of a monument? Let us have an interchange of views on the matter.

Then let us have a meeting of representative men from every district in the county to formulate plans looking to the erection of the monument. Let the matter be pushed and I am sure that by the Fourth of July next the monument can be ready for dedication and the dedicatory service can be made one of the features of Oakland's Fourth of July celebration.

This monument will not only be a tribute of respect to the memory of our country's defenders but will be an inspiration to the young people and help them to remember something of the price that was paid for our liberties. Let us hear from others.

Very respectfully,
A. F. GEORGE.

HIGH MOUNTAIN, LOW PRICE.

Editor Refutes Chicago Charge—He Is Not a Grafter Because There Is Nothing to Graft—Esteemed Contemporary a Poor Shot.

[Copyright, 1907, by E. C. Parcells.]

Any one wanting a mountain 1,950 feet high to sit on during the heated season will please address this office. We have one for sale cheap. We got it by advertising a forty rod whisky before the pure food law came into operation.

A Chicago paper charges us with being at the head of the grafters in this territory. Bless your soul, but there hasn't been enough graft in Arizona in the last five years to buy food for an old crow. We are all honest because we have to be.

A year ago ex-Judge Scott entered the Kicker office bent on our destruction. After he had fired five shots at us we shot his left ear off and drove him out. The ear has been in a jar of alcohol ever since, and the other day the judge began suit against us to recover the souvenir. He wants to stitch it on and see if it won't grow. To the straight shooter belongs the spoils, and we'll fight the thing clear to the highest court.

Our esteemed contemporary insists that he fired six shots at us as we were coming home from a poker party last Tuesday night and that if we had given him six more chances he could have dropped us. Sorry for him, poor old chap! But is it ever to be thus?

Not as editor, postmaster, deputy United States marshal or mayor of Giveadam Gulch, but as plain Jim Hellso, we rode our horse in a race over at Lone Pine the other day and scooped in $100 in cash to buy silk undershirts for such members of congress as are not owned by any trust and must practice economy.

Some critter who didn't have time to sign his name writes us from Santa Fe that he will arrive in this town in about two weeks and shoot six redhot bullets into our despicable carcass. Good! Things are going a little slow, and we'd like a change. Kick open the door of our sanctum and come right in.

A party named "Bull" Williams, who was hanging around the Gulch three or four months ago and who refused to let the vigilance committee hang him gently by the neck, went off to Utah and was lynched the other day by an excited mob. How few men know what's good for 'em!

Several letters have reached us asking us to define our position, editorially, as to the next presidential candidate. Not by a jugful! We are holding three government positions, and we don't propose to lose them by coming out now and yawping for some particular man who may not come within gunshot of securing the nomination. We wish the country well, but we wish ourself better.

The air of Arizona is bracing, and the territory is full of grand scenery, but if we were a stranger to the people we should neither take the air nor view the scenery from an auto. Our people as a people can't get used to anything going on four wheels. It's a four legged country. Come on a cayuse and you will find a hospitable welcome.

At the last meeting of the common council City Marshal Day offered his resignation, and the same was accepted. He had served four months, and during that time was wounded five times. He thinks he got too many bullets for the salary received. Any good two handed shooter who wants a steady income of $12 per week will address or apply to us as mayor. In case of death he will be buried at the expense of the city.

We got an idea the other day that the mail from Pine Valley ought to be expedited, and we rode out on the trail for seven miles and then turned in behind the loafing mail rider and began yelling and shooting. It was a success. The mail was expedited by a full half hour, and the carrier rode into the Gulch to claim that a gang of five highway robbers had tried to hold him up. It is such little incidents as this that endear us to the heart of the postmaster general and bring all petitions for our removal to naught.

We were coming back from Lone Jack the other day in something of a hurry, being mounted on our piebald broncho, when, at the crossing of Dog creek, a road agent tried to hold us up. We told him we'd see him later and galloped on, and he put two bullets through our hat and turned away. It may console him to learn that the amount of cash on hand at that time was just 15 cents.

Since we have ceased lying about our circulation our health and spirits have improved 50 per cent, and all have noticed a great and agreeable change in us. We haven't an ache or pain and go around with a grin on our phiz and a song in our heart. It was an awful burden on our back to keep lying from week to week, claiming a circulation of several millions when we had less than a thousand, and we are glad to roll it off. Let other editors try it. They will be astonished at the results.

The Chicago man who arrived here two weeks ago to set up a retail shop for the sale of trust beef and who was hiding in the hills two days after has reached Utah and made a statement in the newspapers. He denounces us as a set of cannibals and barbarians. Well, we have our little frailties, and one of them is a lack of love for anything in the shape of trusts. If religion was a trust we'd have the devil here to beat it if it cost us a hundred dollars a day.

We are asked the question by a noted divine in the east, "Can an editor live a consistent Christian life?" We don't know the object of the inquiry, but we argue that the man who asks the question never read a newspaper for three consecutive days. We wouldn't trust even the editor of an agricultural paper with our hat to hold while we spoke at a convention. Newspaper editing is a profession that requires a peculiar sort of men. They must not be handicapped.

Mr. George Lake of Pine Hill meets up with Mr. Tom White of Lone Jack, and both draw and begin shooting. Twelve bullets fired and a dog killed. Then they embrace and proceed to the nearest saloon, and the 200 men who have gathered to see the fun walk away with tears of shame and humiliation rolling down their cheeks. Is Arizona Arizona no longer? Is it owing to the sun spots? Are we becoming a race of fish worms?

During the quarter ending June 1 over 600 bullets were fired into the front doors of the city hall by cowboys and others. The city has now two barrels of flattened bullets which have been dug out of the doors and is prepared to claim that it has the richest lead mine in the world. Keep it up, boys. It doesn't hurt the doors any.

M. QUAD.

Always In the Lead.

During the terrible days of 1864, when every available man was being sent to re-enforce Grant's army, a single company of raw recruits arrived from a thinly populated district in Vermont. It was first ordered into action in one of the battles of the Wilderness, and the captain felt called upon to make a speech to his men.

"Soldiers," he began, "we are now going against the enemy. When the orders are given to fire do your best and kill all you can with the forty rounds of ammunition you have. When you have fired it all away you had better retreat. I am a little lame, so I am going to start now."

Both on the Way.

Mamma had sent little Bessie to the pantry to fetch some sticky fly paper. She was gone a long time, and finally the mother called:

"Bessie, hurry with the fly paper. Have you got it?"

There was a pause, and then this in an earnest tone:

"No, mamma, the fly paper's got me. But—we're both coming!"—Woman's Home Companion.

He—What a lovely complexion Miss Pinkleigh has!

She—Yes. That girl's a born artist.—New York Mail.

The Usual Fit.

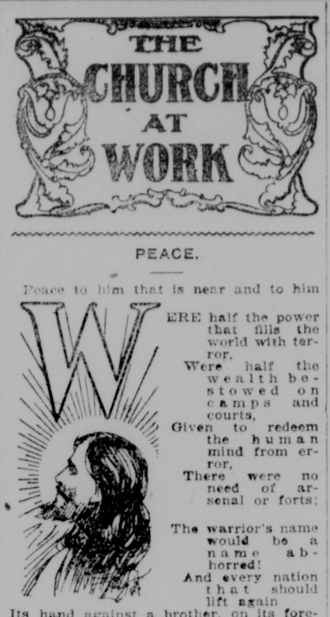
"Great Scott!" ejaculated the polar bear. "What's that terrible row going on over there?"

The walrus looked bored. "Oh," he yawned, "the seal's wife found a mote on her."—New York Press.

A Broad Hint.

Husband—My friend hardly recognized you today.

Wife—That's strange, for I wore the same hat you bought for me three years ago.—Fliegende Blatter.



PEACE.

Peace to him that is near and to him

ERE half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenal or forts;

The warrior's name would be a name abhorred!
And every nation that should lift again
Its hand against a brother, on its forehead
Would wear forevermore the curse of Cain!

Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease;
And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,
I hear once more the voice of Christ say, "Peace!"

Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals
The blast of War's great organ shakes the skies!
But beautiful as songs of the immortals,
The holy melodies of love arise.
—H. W. Longfellow.

BETTER THAN THEY KNEW.

How a Church That Trusted in the Lord Was Vindicated.

A congregation in a hilly district in Ohio bought a small tract of land and erected a church building upon it. Then the question of insurance came up, says the Youth's Companion. Mr. Sipes, the wealthiest member, who had contributed half the money needed for the new structure, declared that he did not believe in insurance. "This is the Lord's building. He'll take care of it," he said.

His view prevailed, and there was no insurance. In a few weeks the building was struck by lightning and almost totally consumed by fire. Mr. Sipes contributing the greater portion of the fund, as before. This time the demand was almost unanimous that it be insured, but Mr. Sipes again objected on the same ground.

"If it burns down again, brethren," he said, "I'll agree to rebuild it myself."

Again he carried his point. In less than a month the new church was struck by lightning again and although strenuous efforts were made to save it, the loss was almost total.

"There must be some reason for this, brethren," said Brother Sipes. "I am going to find out what it is."

Thereupon he employed a force of men to sink a shaft on the site of the twice-destroyed church. Within a few days a rich vein of iron ore was found, and the church property was sold for many times the amount needed to buy land in another locality and build again.

"I tell you, brethren," said Brother Sipes, "it pays to trust the Lord. He's a great deal better business manager than anybody in this congregation."

THY KINGDOM COME.

Mrs. T. MacKnight, late of Teneriffe, Canary islands, writes: These islands are now an open field. They include seven islands, Canary, Teneriffe, Fuerteventure, Lanzarote, Palma, Hierro and Gomera. There is a call for evangelical work everywhere, and for school work in both Teneriffe and Canary."

The National Plant, Flower and Fruit guild of New York distributes flowers among the sick and poor, in hospitals and in homes. Last year it gave out 365,853 bunches of summer flowers, 34,515 bunches of function flowers, 8,990 plants and 1,484 bulbs.

Rev. Antonio B. Carrero, a preacher of the Mexican Evangelical church, writes that the Gospel is making excellent progress in that country. His own church, in Mexico City, has 150 members.

E. Tennyson Smith, the well-known English evangelist, has sailed for England, after a most successful world tour, which included the United States, Australia and New Zealand. He will return to this country in 1908.

Faith is often as little effective for righteousness as unbelief, because it lacks grip.

Dr. Clark found seven Christian Endeavor societies in Chile in his recent tour of South America—one English-speaking and six Spanish.

New Y. M. C. A. for Milwaukee.

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars have been raised at Milwaukee, Wis., for the construction of a new Y. M. C. A. The campaign was conducted in the following manner: "In the first place, there was a citizens' committee, composed of many of the best known men in the city. On it served bankers, brokers, lawyers, doctors and men in every professional line, as well as many mechanics. The committee worked day and night for three weeks during the time allotted for raising the fund. In addition there were ten captains, who had teams of a dozen men each. These teams were made up of young 'hustlers' from every walk of life, who held tenaciously on until the goal was reached."

Happiness.

When we have learned that happiness
Is of ourselves a willing part,
The subtile something in the mind
That waits to cheer the troubled heart—
When we have learned that wealth and show
Have naught to do with giving joy,
Then will philosophy be king
And living purged of all alloy.

'Tis not the jewels nor the crown,
Nor yet the awesome titled name,
'Tis not emolument nor pelf,
Nor high estate nor living fame,
That gives the happiness we seek
Or brings the pure contentment sought—
'Tis only knowing how to fill
The heart with cheerful, wholesome thought!

It does not help to fret and chafe
Or pine for far off tinsel things.
Contentment has no room to thrive
Where discontentment grows its stings,
He only magnifies his ills
Who broods upon his pressing woe.
'Tis better far to dwell on joy
That strives to ride the undertow!

Think always of the golden glow
That blooms beside your snug abode,
And take no thought of stifling weed
That grows along the dusty road.
Let in the peace; shut out the thought
Of surging troubles that annoy,
And teach your heart to cultivate
The fragrant buds of peace and joy!

Turn back the blighting curse, Unrest!
Scourge ever valiantly the snake
That seeks to sink its poisoned fangs
Within your heart for Discord's sake.
Keep out the blight, let in the sun
And learn how Happiness will grow
If only you will give it room
To fill your heart with golden glow!

By the Way.

It possibly is true that truth is mighty, but I have my doubts about it always prevailing.

The trouble is that we all want money to burn.

The editor said in his obituary notice that Mrs. Haskins was about to join Mr. Haskins in Heaven, but to his wife he remarked there should be some way to warn Haskins.

A chorus girl never loses her diamonds in a town where there is no newspaper.

Nature seldom makes a mistake.

The deeper a man's mind, the more he loves the greatness of solitude.

About the time we become philosophical enough to enjoy life, the Reaper comes along with his mowing machine.

There is an old Chinese superstition that it is unlucky to hit anyone with a slipper. The small boy should inculcate this Chinese idea into the mind of his mother. Is there anything in the Chinese boobook that advises against paternal sessions in the woodshed?

No one can blame the candy-maker's daughter for being stuck up. Isn't she too sweet!

A man may lead his bride to the altar, but from that moment on she is through with being led—so make the most of it!

Trouble merely accentuates the sunshine.

It is all right for a business man to leave his troubles in his desk when he starts for home, but it is also just as well that the wife put hers in a safe out-of-the-way place at least until after dinner. Putting aside his own troubles to go home and hear his wife rehearse hers, is even worse for the man than battling with the ones he is familiar with at the office.

Don't fail. The world will forgive you everything else.

It is better to be lonesome than to have your conscience for bad company.

The woman who thinks she can be nearly naughty, but not quite, is fine material for Mephisto.

Many a man is good because he is too fat and lazy to keep up the old gait.

The characteristic most desired in a wife, next to purity, is cheerfulness. The average business man can soak up a lot of this if given the opportunity.

The railroad man has to have his punch, although, generally, he is not a drinking man.

Home always appeals to the man who has missed the last train.

Love based on nothing but beauty, will soon fade.

Snake Story.

Thousands of snakes of the pine species, measuring from six to seven feet long, are again creating havoc at the Farm dam, near Oconto. The reptiles undermined the dam in the spring of 1906, and it had to be rebuilt. During the work of reconstruction, the snakes greatly retarded the workmen, becoming so bold as to crawl on the tables while the men were at mess. Guards have been placed at the dam, and one, Hugh Herald, killed forty-five in one day, none less than seven feet long. Great destruction will result should the dam go out again.—Wisconsin Newspaper.

Editor Embarrassed.

We have gone to the expense of purchasing a very fine wood stove and have it set up ready for use, but no one has come in to deliver any wood on subscription. It will take a cord of wood to relieve the embarrassing situation.—Hobart (Neb.) Republican-Herald.

TEA INSTEAD OF WHISKY.

What Is Being Done in England to Lessen Liquor Drinking.

Tea gardens are established wherever possible, prizes are offered for the prettiest, best-kept premises, and luncheons and teas are served to motorists and cyclists in bright, cozy rooms entirely separated from the bar. A decided difference is made as to the accommodations in the bar and those in the refreshment rooms; the former plain and clean but not attractive, the latter adorned with pictures, and flowers blooming in window boxes, and furnished with plenty of little tables and comfortable chairs, and in many cases daily papers on file. Sales of liquor have fallen off, while tea, coffee and food are sold in large quantities. It is found that even those who have been in the habit of tippling will order tea and coffee readily, when the cost is the same and the substitutes are really good. Eight gallons of tea have been sold in one house before breakfast; in another, where only intoxicants had formerly been sold, luncheons and teas were served to 720 persons during the first five months of company management.

Quaint, old-fashioned names for the inns have been retained—such as the Royal Oak, Hare and Hounds, Red Lion, Green Man, Norfolk Hero, Rose and Crown, Rose and Portcullis, the Plume of Feathers, etc.

Profits from the sale of liquor, says the Craftsman, have paid for improved lighting, water supply, drinking fountains, district nurses, infirmaries, school funds, libraries, baths and small parks. In one little town a bowling green for the pleasure of the villagers who are fond of the old-time but still popular game of bowls is supported entirely from the profits of the sale of liquor in the local public house.

WHAT THE WORLD DRINKS.

Britain Shown to Be at the Top of Drinkers.

Some interesting facts are brought to light in a statistical abstract issued by the board of trade of the city of London, England, showing how the various nations of the civilized world compare with each other in their consumption of alcoholic beverages.

The latest figures available are those for 1905, and they show the total amount of wine, beer and spirits consumed in the British empire and 14 foreign countries.

The following table shows the consumption per head in gallons of the populations of the principal countries in 1905:

	Beer.	Wine.	Spirits.
United Kingdom	27.7	0.27	0.91
Australia	11.3	1.27	0.96
Canada	5.4	0.10	0.94
United States	16.8	0.25	1.23
Germany	26.3	1.61	1.43
Belgium	48.8	1.03	1.10
France	7.5	32.90	1.37
Russia	1.02	....	0.95

The following table shows the consumption in 1891 (14 years previously):

	Beer.	Wine.	Spirits.
United Kingdom	30.5	0.39	1.03
Australia	11.7	1.09	1.13
Canada	3.8	0.11	0.74
United States	12.6	0.36	1.24
Germany	23.2	0.67	1.69
Belgium	39.2	0.90	1.87
France	4.8	23.00	1.68
Russia	0.70	....	0.89

The value of the return chiefly consists in its leading to further examination. It will be observed that the return is in gallons, and a gallon of spirits consumed does not favor comparison with a similar quantity in beer.

Must Be Sober.

The employes of the Lehigh Valley railroad must hereafter live sober, temperate lives. Orders have been issued whereby each employe, from conductors down, will be compelled to attach their signatures to a document stating that they had taken a temperance pledge and would not use liquor in any form hereafter. Just how the order will be received by the engineers, conductors and brakemen is a question, but one of the railroaders, in discussing the cold water move, stated that he considered the order a good one and would prove beneficial to the company and its employes. One of the officials of the company stated that he was unable to understand why a man upon whom rests the lives and safety of thousands could even think of indulging in any habits that might tend to injure his mental capacity.

Chargeable to Drink.

Reports from last year show that in Montrose, England, 50 per cent. of the persons dealt with by the police were under the influence of liquor when they committed the offense. Sheriff Baillie, of Hawick, says: "Drink is one of the greatest curses of the country. But for drink there would be very little crime." Throughout the United Kingdom from 50 to 84 per cent. of offenders arrested were either drunk or had been drunk when the offense was committed.

Plan Fight on Saloon.

The Young Men's Christian association leaders of Philadelphia are planning to fight the saloon by the establishment of workingmen's clubs, and a contrally located lunch room, at which meals can be secured for 15 cents, while wagons will convey beerless lunches to stores and factories throughout the center of the city.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe take "Preventics," special pure defiant for Prevention. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. Six to ten Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, if taken early—at the sneeze stage—that tired, dull head of those early colds. That's purely Preventics. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Safe for the children—and thoroughly safe for all. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Preventics may also save half your usual summer sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness. Lighter day, Preventics probably flee Preventics' speedy effects. Preventics may be borne for the pocket, also in the house. Preventics. Insist on Your Druggist Having.

Great Wealth Not Proof of Dishonesty.

By Chancellor E. BENJAMIN ANDREWS of the University of Nebraska.

IT is the crowning baseness of our time—which is saying a good deal—this selecting for a victim some character so distinguished as to assure piquancy and a market for inventions and then, CRAFTILY AVOIDING SUABLE LIBEL and relying for fuller protection on the victim's known kindliness, industry and dignity, proceeding to VIVISECT him for pay. None of the business villainies alleged to be so rife could compare in ATROCITY with these squalid campaigns of libel and libelous caricature which recent months have produced.

IF A MAN CAN FRAUDLESSLY BECOME POSSESSOR OF $10,000 HE CAN, IF HE WORKS ON WITH THE SAME ZEAL, SKILL AND POWER, NOT ONLY AS EASILY, BUT MORE EASILY, SECURE A HUNDRED THOUSAND, TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND, FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND, A MILLION, A HUNDRED MILLION DOLLARS.

Just here financial geniuses find opportunity. Now and again arises amid the common throng of business men one with the ability to utilize to the end that SEMIAUTOMATIC POWER to set and keep this $100,000,000 earning with the same precision governing his first investment. HE COMBINES INDUSTRY WITH INDUSTRY AND EFFECTS SAVING. He takes advantage of rivals' errors and hesitancy. If he becomes a BILLIONAIRE you have no right to denounce any part of his fortune SAVE UPON PROOF OF FRAUD. The mere fact of his being so rich is naught but proof of his genius and his industry.

Business Needs a Rest.

By WILLIS L. KING, Vice President of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Company.

YOU have doubtless heard the story of the man in perfect health who was put to bed by his friends, who had agreed among themselves to make the experiment of telling him that he looked bad and should see a doctor. The country, I think, IS IN DANGER OF SOME SUCH FATE.

The pessimism of the eastern press is almost universal, and the conservative optimist seems relegated to the "way back" seat. FORTUNATELY the west does not share in this pessimism.

THE CONDITIONS DO NOT WARRANT ALARM, BUT DO ADMONISH THOUGHTFUL MEN THAT THE TREMENDOUS EXPANSION OF THE LAST FEW YEARS MUST TAKE A REST UNTIL THE FINANCIAL EQUILIBRIUM OF THE COUNTRY IS RE-ESTABLISHED. THIS DOES NOT, I FEEL, MEAN AN EXTENDED OR EXTREME INTERFERENCE WITH BUSINESS, BUT A GRADUAL AND HEALTHY READJUSTMENT, IN WHICH THERE WILL BE A SATISFACTORY VOLUME AND FAIR PRICES.

Such commodities as are now selling at fair and reasonable prices based on their cost will not suffer, but anything that has been UNDULY ADVANCED BY REASON OF THE GREAT DEMAND will find its proper level.

The country is certainly richer than it was a year or even three months ago. The farmers have harvested a $7,000,000,000 crop, and the mines have added many millions to our wealth. It is the part of wisdom, therefore, TO AWAIT THE FUTURE WITH CONFIDENCE and not be carried away by a fear of something that is not at all likely to happen.

Suffrage Movement Doomed to Failure.

By Miss PHOEBE COUZINS, Lawyer and Former Suffragist.

THE participation of women in politics does not raise the tone in the least. I have proof of that. I have seen lovely women take their carriages and go into the slums of the city, where a smile and some silver would bring easy votes, and spend their time on election day to put into office MEN WHO HAD BROKEN ALL THE LAWS IN THE DECALOGUE save possibly that of outright murder.

Then, too, I have been forced to the MOURNFUL CONCLUSION that women were not designed by the Creator for the ROUGH AND TUMBLE ACTIVITY OF PUBLIC AND POLITICAL LIFE. They haven't the necessary stamina for public life; they can't stand up under it as men can. Nature hasn't endowed them with the needed nervous force. Then they cannot look at public questions IMPERSONALLY. They persist in confounding personalities with principles. In all movements requiring organization woman is a FAILURE. In philanthropy, art, literature, charity, women are all right, but when it comes to politics they are distinctly OUT OF PLACE.

I SPEAK AS ONE HAVING KNOWLEDGE, AND I SAY THAT IT IS MY FIRM BELIEF THAT THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT HAS REACHED ITS MERIDIAN AND IS DOOMED.

Churches to Blame For Unrest.

By Rabbi STEPHEN S. WISE of New York.

CIVIC righteousness and the advocacy of PRACTICAL MORALITY IN BUSINESS LIFE today lie outside of and beyond the efforts of the churches. The churches should take as their motto, "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's and to God the things which are God's—but all are God's." THE AFFAIRS OF THE CITY ARE THE AFFAIRS OF GOD.

The churches of the land have FAILED, else we would not be looking on the spectacle which faces us today, the violation of stewardship by men of high degree.

THE SHAME AND INIQUITY IN THE HIGH PLACES IN THE WORLD OF AFFAIRS CONSTITUTE A TERRIBLE INDICTMENT OF THE CHURCHES IN SO FAR AS THEY HAVE FAILED TO TEACH WITH CONQUERING AUTHORITY THAT A DISHONEST BANKER CANNOT BE A GOOD JEW AND THAT A LOOTING DIRECTOR CANNOT BE A TRUE CHRISTIAN.

LOOSENING THE TENSION.

The last straw that broke the proverbial camel's back was no larger or heavier than the thousands of others which the animal had carried and with seeming ease. But finally the load became too heavy and one more straw broke him down. For the past ten years there has been a constant and ever increasing measure of prosperity in this country, with prices continually rising until it appears that the top notch has about been reached. We have learned to live high and spend money freely. The laboring man sets a table like a king and has more luxuries than the well-to-do of a few years ago. Profits and wages have kept going up together and business has been accelerated until the speed limit has about been reached. It is fast becoming a question of checking down speed, of bouncing the tension, or getting beyond control and bringing disaster widespread and far reaching. Profits can't continue to increase indefinitely, wages won't forever be on the advance and the sooner people realize that it is better to maintain a conservative rate of speed and keep on going than to exceed the limit and have a break down, the better it will be for all concerned. The wage earner, the middle man, the shop keeper, the manufacturer, the capitalist must all learn to be content with what everybody realizes is reasonable compensation for energy of person or property. To go beyond this is to invite disaster. To seek unreasonably profits is to court illegitimate enterprise and foster get-rich-quick schemes which are a menace to the public welfare. The people ought to do all they can to cultivate conservatism and discourage alike the financial adventurer and the unreasonable profit taker. The policy of live and let live will serve a much better purpose in the long run for all our institutions than the policy of while you are getting get all you can in wages, in rents, in interest, in profits, in everything. There is wealth enough and to spare in America and we shall never need for any good thing so long as the people are conservative and honest.

BRIQUETTE, THE NEW FUEL.

It is hardly to be supposed that the long suffering householder will ever get any benefit from it, but the report received at the navy department this week of the successful trial of briquette fuel on the torpedo boat Biddle, opens up a new and interesting vista in the fuel problem and promises the coal mines a new lease of life. Estimates made by competent scientists in the past year put a period of 75 years for the life of the existing hard coal mines at the present rate of consumption. This was assuming that there was no new way found of utilizing fuel for the production of light, heat and power. But the fuel division of the Geological Survey has been working on the problem and has found out a number of important things of which the test of briquette fuel is one of the concrete demonstrations. Briquettes are blocks of fuel made from a slack coal or low grade coal, mixed with a small percentage of pitch or other substance to hold it together and shaped under great pressure. They have never been used in this country heretofore because coal was too cheap and plenty. But now that the end of the coal is within measurable distance, it is comforting to know that they can be made and will do the work. In fact it is said that they prove better for steam producing on the Biddle than first class coal that was used under one of the other boilers. There are millions of tons of slack coal on the dumps of the coal mines in this country. All of this has hitherto been considered waste. Now it is a valuable asset. But the fuel experts have discovered another thing in their investigation, and that is that the gas engine is more economical than the steam engine of the same horsepower. It has found also that more and better gas for engine purposes can be made from low grade coal and lignite, heretofore absolutely useless for fuel, than can be made from the best high grade coal. This opens up an almost limitless field of fuel that exists in most parts of the United States and that has always been considered valueless. All these discoveries will tend to prolong the life of the coal mines and ought to reduce the price of coal to the householder. They probably will not, but it is something even to know that they should.

Silver Tube in His Shroat.

Mr. John J. Humbird, of Cumberland, Md., for years prominent in racing circles, is seriously ill at the City Hospital with a disease of the throat.

A delicate operation, in which a silver tube was inserted in the windpipe to prolong life, was performed by Dr. Esker, and it is thought that Mr. Humbird will live. He went to the hospital Wednesday. Mr. Humbird is a brother of Justice Jacob B. Humbird, who was one of the candidates on the Democratic ticket for the House of Delegates at the recent election. He is also a cousin of Mr. J. Wilson Humbird, the Cumberland capitalist.—Baltimore Sun.

A. HUNTER BOYD IS CHIEF JUDGE.

Governor Warfield Names Him as Judge McSherry's Successor.

An Annapolis special, Nov. 12, to the Baltimore Sun says:

Governor Warfield tonight announced the appointment of Judge A. Hunter Boyd, of Cumberland, Chief Judge of the fourth judicial circuit, as Chief Justice of the Maryland Court of Appeals, to succeed the late Chief Judge James McSherry, of Frederick. Judge Boyd will qualify tomorrow morning and assume his new duties, as the court will then resume its sittings.

The appointment of Judge Boyd was a surprise, and came unexpectedly to Judge Boyd. Five of the judges of the Court of Appeals assembled here tonight to resume the October term, and the Governor, who also came down, sent for Judge Boyd to call on him at the Government House in connection with a matter of importance. Upon the arrival of Judge Boyd at the Government House the Governor then announced that he had decided to appoint his Chief Justice. Judge Boyd felt much surprised and expressed much appreciation over the honor. As soon as his appointment became known, Judge Boyd received warm congratulations from his associates on the bench and friends in Annapolis. When seen tonight by the Sun correspondent Judge Boyd said:

"I naturally feel highly gratified over the high honor conferred on me and realize the great responsibilities and the duties resting on me as Chief Justice. I will rely upon my associates on the bench and members of the bar throughout the State for the support that has always been given to the justices who have filled the same position in the State's highest judiciary."

In Annapolis the appointment of Judge Boyd was very favorably received and will undoubtedly meet with approval throughout the State. Governor Warfield stated tonight that he had not decided as to whom he would appoint Chief Judge of the sixth judicial circuit, in place of Judge McSherry.

Last July the name of Judge Boyd was brought forward for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination, and although sentiment did not crystalize for him at the time his wide popularity was attested by the compliments that were passed upon him as a judge. It was urged then that he was a man of high character and that his record on the bench was unassailable. At the same time it was pointed out by those who were reluctant to see him retire to private life or return to the practice of his profession that it would be difficult for him to be re-elected in 1908, because the fourth district is heavily Republican.

The son of a Presbyterian minister, Judge Boyd was born in Winchester, Va., July 15, 1849. After receiving his elementary education there he entered Washington College, now Washington and Lee University, at Lexington, Va., in 1865. He remained two sessions at this institution and then spent one session in the University of Virginia. In 1869 he began the study of law in Winchester, and was deputy clerk of the county court until 1870, when he entered the law school at Lexington. He received the degree of bachelor of law in June, 1871. In the August following he settled permanently in Cumberland, Md., and began to practice his profession. In 1875 he was elected State's attorney for Allegany county.

Upon the appointment of the late Chief Judge Alvey, of the Maryland Court of Appeals, as chief justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, May, 1903, Mr. Boyd was appointed chief judge of the fourth judicial circuit. He was elected in the fall of that year for a full term of 15 years. Before his appointment to the bench Judge Boyd had won a high reputation at the bar. He had been the attorney for the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. In all public questions he had taken an active interest and for many years has been one of the leading citizens of Cumberland and one of the leaders of the bar of the State.

Judge Boyd married Miss Bessie M. Thruston in Cumberland in 1874. Mr. A. Hunter Boyd, Jr., who is a member of the Baltimore bar, and Mr. J. Thruston Boyd, who is in business in Cumberland, are sons. Mr. E. Holmes Boyd, an attorney, and Dr. Philip Boyd, both of Winchester, are brothers.

THREE DOUBLE HOLIDAYS.

A Glance at The Calendar For The Next Year.

Next year Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day and the Fourth of July fall on Saturday, thus giving the public three double holidays. Ordinarily these three do not come on the same day of the week, but by the intervention of February 29 this year Washington's Birthday falls just 14 weeks earlier than Memorial Day, which regularly comes five weeks before the Fourth of July. The advantage to the busy public of having these holidays fall on Saturday so that they have two days of leisure together is obvious. In creating the last holiday—Labor Day—advantage of this principle was taken in the selection of Monday instead of a selected day of the month. In 1909 Washington's Birthday falls on Monday and May 30 and the Fourth of July on Sunday, which will mean a Monday observance, so that for two years in succession double holidays are assured. In the latter year Christmas will also fall on Saturday, thereby affording the most complete trial of the double holiday possible in our calendar.

STEADY SPREAD OF PROHIBITION.

It Now Covers About One-half of the State of Maryland.

Mr. Edwin Higgins, Baltimore, is preparing the draft of the local-option law which the Anti-Saloon League will urge the Legislature to pass. Mr. Higgins is a well known veteran in the temperance cause. He was president of the Maryland State Temperance Alliance from 1884 to 1891, inclusive, and was the Prohibition party candidate for Governor in 1891. The local option bill that he is preparing is based on the Illinois law.

Mr. Higgins' researches show that a state of legislative chaos exists in Maryland that is probably without a parallel in the country. Not only are different counties under different laws relating to the liquor traffic, but different districts and parts of districts are under different laws.

Legislation against the liquor traffic dates back to the Colonial period. As early as 1702, the Society of Friends of West River petitioned the Governor and his council to prohibit the sale of liquor within two miles of their meetinghouses, and in 1723 finally succeeded in obtaining the desired law. It has been the model of numerous enactments of the same character ever since. The first prohibitory law passed by the Legislature of the State of Maryland was the Act of 1846, Chapter 90. The act made it unlawful for the clerk of the Montgomery county Circuit Court to issue licenses within three miles of the District of Columbia line and certain other localities, without a special order of the court on petition of respectable inhabitants of the neighborhood.

Mr. Higgins gives the following summary of the present situation in Maryland:

No licenses may issue in the following counties, except as noted: Anne Arundel (except Annapolis and part of the Fifth District), Calvert, (except Chesapeake Beach), Caroline, Cecil, Dorchester, Harford, (except Havre de Grace), Howard, (except Ellicott City), Kent, Montgomery, Queen Anne's, Somerset and Talbot.

Licenses are issued in the remaining counties of the State, but there are numerous localities in which prohibition is established by special acts, with results as noted below;

Allegany (except Third Election district, Narrows Park, Potomac river and Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.)

Baltimore (except one neighborhood.)

Charles (in 1884 gave 1078 majority for license, 1906 gave 241 majority for license.)

Frederick (except Third, Eighth, Tenth, Thirteenth, Fifteenth, Seventeenth, Eighteenth and Nineteenth election districts—8 out of 38, also 34 neighborhoods.)

Garrett (except Second, Sixth, Tenth and Twelfth districts; the Third outside of Grantsville; the Fourteenth, outside of Oakland; also, nine neighborhoods.)

Prince George's (except First district, Laurel and six neighborhoods. Laurel discarded its $500 license after a trial of two years and adopted prohibition in April, 1906.)

St. Mary's (except that no license may issue within two miles of Charlotte Hall without the consent of the trustees of that institution.)

Washington (except the Sixteenth district, Potomac river and Chesapeake and Ohio canal, road to High Rock at Blue Ridge Summit, and also area within one-quarter mile of Agricultural Fair grounds, without the consent of the managers.)

Wicomico (except 10 election districts, leaving only 4 districts in which licenses are legal.)

Worcester (except 3 neighborhoods.)

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The recent unfortunate burning of the postoffice building here is the general theme of conversation. As to the origin of the fire there is but one opinion—that it was deliberately set on fire by some person or persons. There always is a motive for firing property, but the motive in this case is not known. Whether it was to conceal a robbery, out of spite against the owners or occupants of the building or hope of gain in some way is yet to develop. A thorough and searching investigation has been commenced by the insurance companies involved and Mountain Lal Park Association, and it is to be hoped that the State Fire Marshall will be able to give it his personal attention. The community is very anxious for the arrest and severe punishment of the perpetrator of this dastardly outrage.

The postoffice, which was temporarily established in Mr. Enoch Kessner's barbershop, was yesterday transferred to the storeroom next door, which is a large room and well suited for the purpose. Mr. Rudisill exhibited his usual energy, never missed a mail and in ten days had a new office fitted up and every department in perfect order.

The series of meetings which were to have commenced in the M. E. church Sunday had to be postponed a week on account of the failure to get the new heating plant installed. The cottage prayer meetings are being continued nightly in the cottages here and in Loch Lynn.

Miss Rose Wilson returned to her home here Saturday from Wheeling, W. Va., where she attended the marriage of her brother Charles and Miss Margaret McLain, which took place at the home of the bride Nov. 7th.

A family named Conaway moved into Indiana cottage last week.

Mr. Henry May and family have moved to Hagerstown, Md., for the winter.

Drs. Baldwin and Richards, of the Board of Directors, and Dr. W. Davis, General Manager of the Mountain Lake Park Association, were here last week. The Board will not decide as to a new postoffice building until later.

Mr. Charles Weimer recently returned from a week's visit to Philadelphia.

Mrs. Lewis, of Westernport, Md., is visiting her sister here, Mrs. A. R. Sperry.

A Boston schoolboy was tall, weak and sickly.

His arms were soft and flabby. He didn't have a strong muscle in his entire body.

BRAKEMAN STRUCK AND KILLED.

Stepped in Front of a Fast Freight at Mountain Lake Park.

Brakeman Earnest Mitchell, of Cumberland, was instantly killed at Mt. Lake Park last Thursday evening by being struck by the locomotive of a fast freight train.

The engine drawing the train upon which Mr. Mitchell was employed, had been derailed at the Park, having been shifted to the side track at that point. The young man stepped from the side track directly in front of the train with the result as above stated. His body was removed to his late home in Cumberland the same evening and on Sunday was interred.

Mr. Jacob Morrison, track foreman, who was assisting to replace the derailed engine on the track, was scalded by escaping steam about his head and face.

Conductor Flaherty who fell under a train at Hardman some time ago, having a limb so seriously crushed that it was found necessary to make an amputation, left the Sanitarium on Saturday for his home in Hutton, Md. Capt. Flaherty experienced a remarkable recovery following the amputation, and, minus the foot, went home in splendid condition.—Grafton Republican.

The life of an editor is not all roses. If he pleases one faction he displeases the other. He is accused of saying too much about someone and too little about another. If he suggests a remedy for any social evil a large part the community is profuse in its expressions of disapproval. So he taxes his weary brain to escape the shoals that mean shipwreck to so many editors.

Last Thursday night the Garrett County Bar Association gave a farewell supper in honor of Mr. Norman S. Last Friday evening in Hart's Hall a unique entertainment, arranged by Misses Grace Jones, Alice Hart, Nell Sturgiss and Tekla Johnson, was given in honor of the former's guests, Miss Blackman and Miss Painter. The hall was tastily decorated and made to resemble as far possible the natural woodland. Here and there about the floor autumn leaves were arranged upon which cloths were spread and about these the guests assembled and partook of the refreshments—a veritable indoor picnic—as it was intended it should be. About forty persons were present and a most enjoyable evening was spent in roller skating and other pastimes.

Last Saturday afternoon Chief of Police "Teddy" Mason received a telegram from the authorities in Piedmont requesting him to be on the lookout for a seven-year old boy named Davis, son of the agent of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad at that town, who had left home on a freight train earlier in the day and was supposed to be headed toward Fairmont. The boy was found in a steel hopper while the train was at the water station here and taken in charge by the officer, who sent him home on train No. 14 the same afternoon. The lad related a miraculous yarn to the crew of the freight train, telling one of the brakemen that his parents were both dead and that he was on his way to Fairmont, the home of an aunt. The youthful hobo was warmly clad and had a clean waist wrapped up in a newspaper. While he was in charge of the officer here a crowd collected around him but he would not talk even though he was closely questioned

The Star Witness For The Plaintiff Didn't Appear.

The damage suit of John Shartzer against Lloyd Wilburn, removed here from Garrett county, was to have been taken up in the circuit court here this morning, but after the case was called it had to be continued until the next term.

The continuance was necessary because the star witness for the plaintiff failed to appear, and the plaintiff was unwilling to go ahead with the case without said witness. It would seem that the sheriff of Garrett county tried to summon the witnesses in the case by telephone. This means of notifying the witnesses worked all right where they were willing to come, but failed where they were unwilling, for as soon as the latter learned that the sheriff was at the other end of the telephone they hung up the receivers and thus prevented service of the summons. Justice Alexander, who resides at Sang Run, in Garrett county, being such an important witness, the sheriff sent his deputy to that place after the justice refused to be summoned by telephone, and served him with the writ in person. Even after being summoned Justice Alexander refused to obey the mandates of the writ, hence the case had to be continued, and a writ of attachment issued, returnable at next term.

Gilmor S. Hamill, who, with ex-Judge Ferdinand Williams represent the plaintiff, stated in asking for a continuance that Alexander being a justice of the peace, thought his authority was as great as that of a judge.

Messrs. T. J. Peddicord and D. J. Blackiston represent the defendant. The suit is to recover damages for false arrest.—Cumberland Times.

Letter to S. T. Jones.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: If a customer wants $35.50 do you give him $75?

Suppose you should hear of one of your customers doing a thing like that and not knowing it, what would you say next time he wants discount?

We'll venture half your men are doing that very thing without a suspicion.

Men who paint any other paint than Devoe are paying $75 for $35.50 or some other such figure.

10 gallons Devoe is enough for a good size house two coats; 15 or 20 isn't too much of another paint. There's $8.75 or $17.50 for 5 or 10 extra gallons; besides $2 to $4 a gallon for putting it on; that's $10 to $40. That's how half the houses stores factories warehouses, shops, barns, fences are painted; $50 for paint and labor; $25 to $50 more for not knowing what to put-on.

The one to put-on is the paint that takes least bills for paint and labor.

Yours truly

A LONG, COLD WINTER.

At Least So Says the Man With The Sign.

A long cold winter is said to be indicated by many signs and mute forecasts in the surrounding fields and forests. According to an amateur weather prophet there is liable to be plenty of snow. Hunters report that partridges are flying east this year, and are so scary that it is with difficulty any one can approach within several hundred feet of them. It is said they fly up quickly and make for the tall timber, and cannot be driven out into the open. Maryland and Virginia farmers say such action of the birds means a cold winter.

If the partridges spent most of the time on the ground in the fields it would indicate mild weather, but the outlook is not favorable to a warm season.

Those who have observed the operations of the muskrats along Rock Creek in the Zoological Park or in the Potomac marshes about Washington say the little animals are making unusual preparations for a long hard siege of cold weather by building many houses and places of refuge. It has been observed that they are stocking their wintertime abodes with an unusually large supply of grasses and twigs to make their homes strong and secure against the wintry storms and ice and their beds comfortably warm.

Wild geese are already flying southward, farmers say, and they argue that this means an early winter and a cold one.

GORTNER.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather for several weeks, the farmers are having considerable trouble in husking their corn.

C. T. Sanders is building an addition to his barn.

A. W. Killius spent several days with relatives near Gormania last week.

Misses Lizzie and Mary Lichty, who have been visiting relatives at Meyersdale, Pa., returned home one day last week.

Lee Sangers, who has been ill with typhoid fever is better at this writing.

Samuel Slabach was calling on George Killius Sunday.

Merchant P. P. Gortner received another car load of molasses last week and sold out the entire lot in one day.

Sunday school at 9:30 and preaching at 10:30 a. m., also services at 7:30 p. m., in the church. All are welcome.

It will probably be an item of news to most of our readers that our postmaster is not compelled to make change for you when you make purchases at Uncle Sam's office. This is a queer rule that not one in a thousand persons know. Buyers of stamps or any purchases at a postoffice must furnish their own change; i.e., the postmaster could in sist on the buyer furnish his own change if he sees fit to do it, but usually the postmaster is glad enough to get rid of his "chicken feed," and he is always and is willing to accommodate the public by making all the change it asks for. If a man wishes to buy fifty cents worth of stamps and has but a silver dollar, he would be compelled to buy a dollar's worth of stamps or go and get his silver dollar changed or do without his stamps if the postmaster was stubborn and refused to make change for him. This is the law and a queer one according to our way as thinking. And postmasters are not compelled to take more than twenty-five pennies at one time, if they do not want them.

HE WILL HAVE MANY PLUMS TO DISTRIBUTE

Fifteen Hundred Officers at Governor-Elect Crothers' Disposal.

Judge Crothers will have the appointment of 1,500 paid office-holders, in addition to the naming of men on state boards that carry an honorary degree, but have no salary attached. As governor, Mr. Crothers will be a factor for good or bad, according to what his official acts shall be. He will have the appointment of all election supervisors in the state and of the police commissioners of Baltimore city. No two branches of the state administration have it in their power to do more for or against the interests of the people. The protection of the ballot depends largely upon the election supervisors, and the police department of Baltimore city has in past years exercised a bad influence in politics. The present police board, however, appointed by Gov. Warfield, has been non-partisan and has received the commendation and indorsement of the best citizenship.

The incoming governor will have the appointment of magistrates at all of the police station houses, all of whom he has the right to select as Democrats, and the appointment of three liquor license commissioners. The liquor house board, like that of the police board and the board of election supervisors, is non-partisan by law, and will consist of two Democrats and one Republican.

In the appointment of police magistrates, Governor-elect Crothers can reward ten more of his friends. For the full term there is one magistrate for each of the eight station houses and two at large. The salary is $2,100 a year, and there is always a great demand for the places.

Aside from the position of private secretary to the governor, always regarded of course, as a strictly personal appointment the first two places that the incoming governor usually fills are those of Secretary of State and Adjutant General. Each of these places pays $2,000 a year, but the Secretary of State, by acting as secretary to the board of public works, and as secretary to other state boards, can legitimately run his salary up to from $2,500 to $3,000 a year.

And then there is the honorary position of "general" or "colonel" on the governor's staff. No pay is attached to the honor. On the other hand, it is an expense to the man who receives it.

The salary of the governor of Maryland himself is only $4,500 a year, and none of the offices under him pays very handsomly, as mere money goes.

60TH U. S. CONGRESS.

Many Changes Will Be Noted In Both The Senate and House.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 12—When the 60th congress assembles two weeks from next Monday, there will be much about it strange to those who have long been familiar with the personnel of past congresses.

In the house, the Democrats have lost their senior member in point of service, J. H. Bankhead, of Alabama, who was defeated for renomination by Richmond Pearson Hobson, the hero of the Merrimac. The party is not to lose the secvices of Mr. Bankhead, however for he takes the seat in the United States senate made vacant by the death of the venerable Senator Edmund W. Pettus.

Probably the most conspicuous loss on the Republican side of the house is General Grosvenor, of Ohio, whose patriarchial and venerable appearance has for years focused the attention of the galleries, and whose wit and disposition to banter have many a time made the hall ring with laughter when the situation has been so tense as to seem as if nothing but bitter passion could find expression.

Another picturesque figure has disappeared with the retirement of Hon. Joseph C. Sibley, of the Franklin (Pa.) district, who served ten years in the house. He was elected to the 53rd congress as a Democrat and again to the 56th congress, after narrowly escaping nomination as vice-president on the Bryan ticket.

Another old-timer who will be missed is James W. Wadsworth, of the 34th New York district, defeated by Peter A. Porter, Democrat. Mr. Wadsworth served about 18 years in the house, and was chiefly conspicuous on account of his important work as chairman of the committee on agriculture.

Other members of the house who will be missed when the 60th congress assembles are Dowie, of Alabama; Smith, Trimble and Gilbert, of Kentucky; Robertson, of Louisiana; McNary and Sullivan, of Massachusetts; Hunt, of Missouri; Van Duzer, of Nevada; McDermott, of New Jersey; Hearst, Towne and Ruppert, of New York; Patterson and Gudger, of Nort Caralina; Garber, of Ohio; Kline of Pennsylvania; Butler, of Tennessee; Brooks and Field, of Texas; Southall, of Virginia; Dovenor and Davis, of West Virginia; and Bishop, of Michigan. These disappear from the house because they failed of renomination.

Included among the leaders who were renominated, but failed to secure re-election, were such prominent leaders as Babcock, of Wisconsin; Lacey, of Iowa; Blackburn, of North Carolina, McCleary of Minnesota; and Fred Landis, of Indiana.

In the senate the changes will be even more noticeable than in the house. Death has removed from the ranks the two oldest members of that body, Pettus and Morgan, of Alabama, whose places will be taken by former Congressmen Bankhead and Joseph F. Johnson, ex-governor of Alabama.

Berry, of Arkansas, who served twenty years in the senate, is replaced by Jeff Davis. "Fiddling Bob" Taylor takes the place of Senator Carmack, of Tennessee. "Joe" Blackburn, of Kentucky, gives way to Thomas H. Payneter, and Dubois, of Idaho, one of the best politicians in the senate, is succeeded by William E. Borah.

The baby member of the senate will be Elmer Burkett, of Nebraska. But a few months older than Burkett is Joseph M. Dixon, who takes the place of W. A. Clark, the Montana copper king.

Curtis, of Kansas, the first Indian to occupy a seat in the senate, is, by reason of his long service in the house, almost as well known among his associates as if he had long been in the senate. He and Morris Brown, the new senator from Nebraska, who succeeds Millard, have both proclaimed in advance their earnest support of Roosevelt in the carrying out of his policies, and they are therefore looked on as valuable recruits for the administration. William Alden Smith, who takes the seat made vacant by the death of Senator Alger., of Michigan, is well known because of his service in the house.

Simon Guggenheimer, the smelter from Colorada, who succeeds Patterson, is the only extremely rich man among the new senators, and Frank O. Briggs, who succeeds Dryden, of New Jersey, has the distinction of being the only one with whiskers among the new crop of senators.

In the senate, more than in the house the changes will be marked by reason of the character of the men who have retired, and of the marked contrast in some instances between them and the men who are to take their places.

POE ON BALLOT REFORM.

Favors Giving Voter Chance to Write "Straight Democratic Ticket" At Top of Ballot.

"Of course," said Ex-Attorney General John P. Poe last Friday morning, "the next Legislature will make the changes in the election law promised by its candidates during this campaign.

"In this connection I would like the public to get straight on one feature of the present law, which, judging from the foolish talk indulged in during the campaign, very few people understand aright.

"The provision of the present law which causes ballots to be rejected if the cross-mark extends beyond the square in any case was not put in that law as a trick by the men who passed it in the extra session of 1901.

"Precisely that provision was in the Reform League law of 1896. The language of the law with reference thereto was not changed a particle. The only thing that the members of the extra session can be charged with is that they were not wise enough to see that the provision was as bad one and change it.

"There were not as many ballots thrown out under the 1896 law as under the present law on account of crossmarks extending beyond the square, but that was simply due to the fact that most voters in the old days voted the straight ticket. They put their cross-mark in the box opposite the emblem, and as that box was a very large one, naturally few of the cross-marks extended beyond it. But the law then was precisely the same as it is today, and any voter who did extend his mark beyond the box had his ballot thrown out. The provision is unquestionably a bad one, and will be changed by the Legislature next session.

"There will also be other changes. I am in favor of placing a blank space at the top of the ballot wherein a voter can write the words 'Straight Democratic ticket' or 'Straight Republican ticket,' and thereby vote the whole ticket without further marks. That would do away at one stroke with half the trouble of counting the ballots. The straight tickets could be put in one pile and the split tickets in another and the counting would be very much expedited.

"Then it might be well to provide an extra set of judges and clerks in each polling place, to count the vote during the day. Half the vote in every precinct is cast by 12 o'clock, and if that could be counted during the afternoon it would help very much.

"The voting booths ought by all means to be made wider than they are now. Perhaps, too, the ballot can be reduced in size when ballots are not thrown out because the cross-mark extends beyond the square. And there are other changes that it may be desirable to make. But you can count on the Democratic Legislature amending the law to do away with the features that have proved undesirable."

NOTES FROM MEADOWBROOK FARM

By William Pitt

Summer is the time to put in the drains.

Trust in providence, but keep the cultivator tools bright.

For the dairy cows clover hay is far preferable to timothy hay.

The man who does not like cows has no business trying to run a dairy.

Take time to look up a good sire for your flock. Improve your breed as much as possible.

My, how good the vegetables are from that garden now. Pays for all the trouble it cost, now doesn't it?

It's the little foxes that spoil the vines and it is the little leaks on the farm that spoil the farmer's profits.

Have you been putting in to practice this year the new ideas and lessons you gained at the institute last winter?

Better seed, better soil preparation, better cultivation will give better corn crop next year. Try this triple extract of good farming.

The National Dairy show and the National Corn exposition at Chicago in October. Don't fail to plan to attend these two great shows.

The increasing demand for mules and the better prices are making them a most profitable animal to raise. Better get a few and raise some.

Finer, larger berries will be grown on your strawberry vines if you keep the runners cut off after two or three plants have formed from a parent plant.

To be sure, breeding sows do not cost so much at weaning time, but who is keen enough to detect the animals with specially good points? Don't make a practice of it.

Wounds upon sheep which get fly-blown should be treated with kerosene or turpentine, being sure that every maggot is destroyed, after which the wound may be coated over with tar.

Have you ever noticed how quickly you become accustomed to disordered conditions when you make no effort to pick things up? Never look twice at the thing out of order. Pick it up the first time your eyes light on it.

If there is one who would ask, What are the advantages of the silo? let him think on these things: The silo provides fresh, succulent feed the year round; storage of a large amount of feed in small space, and immediate removal of crop from land to make way for other crops.

Though the value of milk, either whole or skimmed, is generally recognized for chicken-rearing and chicken fattening, it is not so much used as it ought to be. On many farms the skim milk all goes to the pigs, and the chickens get none; yet, as experiments have often shown, a brood given all the skim milk shows more rapid gains than upon any other feed.

Farming as Life sees it: Farmers are most prosperous in the temperate regions, quite as one would expect to find them. For in the temperate regions the farming season is only about three months long, leaving the farmer nine months during which to engage in other pursuits and thus earn money to keep his farm going. Very obviously the farmer in the tropics, where the farming season is six, seven, eight or even ten months long, is at a serious disadvantage. Who can blame him if he becomes discouraged and sinks at length into apathy? If you are about to take up farming, with a view to becoming wealthy, by all means secure land in the temperate regions.

It is said that the laurel and the sunflower have been found to be of the greatest use in damp situations. People who live in such spots—especially near undrained land—think there is no help for them but by removal. Successful experiments have shown that it is possible to materially improve the atmosphere in such neighborhoods by the planting of laurels and sunflowers. The former gives off an abundance of ozone, while the latter is potent in destroying the malarial conditions. These two, if planted even on the most restricted scale in a garden, or any ground close to the house, will be found to speedily increase the dryness and salubrity of the atmosphere. The experiment is well worth trying in badly-drained localities.

Let some small cereal grain crop follow timothy.

Crowd the little porkers now to marketable condition.

Well-cured sweet corn stalks make good feed for hogs.

Shelter the sheep from the sun. It is just about as hot in September as in August.

Get the tree-planting habit, so that coming generations will rise and call you blessed.

Have the trough long enough so as to give all the pigs an equal chance at the swill feed.

Get rid of the over-ripe swill barrel. It stinketh unto heaven and maketh man and beast alike to suffer.

The hog which is slow to fatten or is frequently off its feed is a poor one to select for breeding purposes.

Ever get nipped in a cow trade? My, how hot it does make a fellow feel to realize that he has been swindled.

Can you pick out the cows which are paying their way? The only safe test is the scales and the Babcock tester.

Skim milk is about all the young pigs need, it containing all the food ingredients necessary for their growth.

Your failures may not be pleasant to remember, but surely you will not fail to remember them long enough to profit by them.

The pig must be comfortable to make gains during the hot weather. See that shade is provided and that there is plenty of good water.

Do you know that the government forestry department stands by ready to give you specific advice for the improvement of your wood lot?

Make it a rule not to do chores after dark. Plan the work so that the boys and the hired man have their time pretty much for themselves after supper.

The pigs intended for brood sows should be picked from the large litters, but remember that you need a thoroughbred sire to increase the grade of your stock.

Ever figure out what it cost you to raise a colt? The animal which will sell for $200 could not have cost more that $100 to raise. Good margin of profit, don't you think?

Farming is no longer considered a business which requires no special training. Every year sees an improvement in the educational standards of the agricultural colleges.

A good horse is kept good and a poor horse is made better by wise, careful treatment. It's misuse of the horse, as well as of the farm machinery, which brings the early breakdown.

As you go about the chores get the habit of seeing things. Is this or that thing out of place? Does this or that animal act a little out of normal? See the things you can do to make things better while you are just passing by.

What's in the hair? An animal may be judged to some extent by the coarseness or fineness of the hair, the coarse-grained, sluggish and inactive animals having generally coarse, rough hair, and they are also many times ill-natured and vicious.

In a test in Wyoming, lambs fed on field peas made as rapid gain as those fed on corn and alfalfa, but the pea-fed lambs brought ten cents a hundred less than those fed on corn and alfalfa for the reason that the latter showed more fat than the others.

Don't buy the cow until you have tried her, or at least milked her once. A big insight into the animal is obtained in this way, and remember that the man who is not willing to let you prove his claims for an animal is not the man you want to have dealings with.

A few pruning hints for you to paste on the handle of your pruning knife: Prune so as to prevent formation of crotches; keep limbs free from rubbing upon each other. Thin out the top, to admit air and sunlight, but keep it well balanced. Prune from the top down toward the trunk, rather than from the body up. Do not cut off the lower limbs, leaving the trunk exposed to the rays of the sun. Train the heads low; let the limbs come out close to the ground. It means longer lived trees.

Prof. W. J. Elliott, of the dairy department of Montana, has concluded that the creamery and cheese factory end of the dairy business has about been worked to the limit, and that the great advancement in the near future ought to be in the direction of cutting off the heads of the 250-pound butter cows and developing our herds so that we may have the 300 to 400 or even 500-pound butter cows. With this in view he has just started a system of cooperation with every creamery and cheese factory in the state of Montana to see if he can, by a system of records, have every patron of each creamery in the state work toward the development of better herds. Need of such work in other states, too.

THE GROCERY CLUB

SAM SAWYER'S REPORT OF AN ECONOMIC DEBATE.

Cornersville, Ark., Is Inclined to Think That in the German Agreement Kaizer Bill Has Successfully Worked a Con Game on Our Teddy.

Our club met in Sy Jones grocery store las' night pursuant to its nat'ral tendencies. A quorum was present—a quorum in our club consistin' of two or more members present who don't agree on anything that may come up. Several members wus absent 'cause they hadn't come up with the "ready come down" fer their las' week's groceries.

Jim Jackson, who used to lead the quire an' hes a good readin' voice, read a loud one of your artickles on the late "German Agreement" entered into by Teddy an' Bill thru thair speakin' tubes, so to speak. The terms you use es, fer instance, the "export price" an' the "consignin'" of goods wus n't exactly clear to us in the beginnin' of the discushin. One of our members, Bob Sanders, thot that the word "consignin'" meant the sign of the con; an' that it indicated that Kaiser "Bill" had worked a con game on Teddy 'cause they both spoke the same language. Howsomever Jim soon fetched the sun up on the matter an' all wus clear es fer as terms went. Jim's library consists of Daniel Webster's unabridged, an' he can bridge over purty near any stream of difficulties with that.

Jim showed that the "export price" allows the feller that sells the goods to fix his own price on 'em; an' that our custom officers, or policemen of trade, must accept that price an' collect toll on 'em accordingly. 'Spose he's right.

But it 'pears that the "German Agreement" allows the feller (it 's darned hard to beat the Dutch) that makes the goods over there to sell 'em to hisself over here at his own price, consignin' 'em to hisself, jes usin' our custom house fer social clubs goin' to an' comin' from. Boiled down over a slow fire of green wood it sums up sorter like this:

By the "German Agreement" the German deals with himself on both sides of the sea; an' arter he gits thru dodgin' duties he ses: "Vel vhat vill you have mit me?" Thus he becomes the whole derned shootin' match—both exporter an' importer. So thar hain't nothin' left fer our importers but to turn porters or jine our club an' whittle an' spit. This tip 's thairn in advance.

I hain't use to spillin' ink 'cept when I turn over the stand; but I hev always noticed that orthografy, grammer, an' retric hain't no use less you hev something to say an' a way of sayin' it. Book larnin' 's apt to lead a feller into thinkin' that he can think. Ten times to a baker's dozen that the feller with the "sheep-skin" can't skin a sheep; nor would he know "taller" from hog grease when it comes to the fryin' out of things.

The majority of our club are Democrats an' hanker arter "Free Trade" 'cause they hain't nothin' to trade an' want something free. They strike an' erudite attitude 'cause the college professors are free traders. They hain't nothin' agin the tariff 'cause it's a robber; fer they hain't nothin' to be robbed of! An' havi'n nothin' to protect they don't care a tinker's d—n about protecshun. They whittle fer a livin' an' care more about shavins than fer a shave. But right here in our club I'll bet thar's more statesmanship goin' to waste than 's bein' wasted in Washington.

The next subject fer discushun is "Free Trade or Tariff—Which?" at which thar 's expected to be some conclushuns an' other things drawn. I'll send you a summery of 'em.

SAM SAWYER, Secretary.

P. S.: Summer's flood-tide 's in. The bloomin' meadows hev splashed the foot-hills with foam. The chestnut trees stand along the hillside at noon lookin' like rolled up clouds colored by a half-faded sunset. The oaks are full of acorns, which means a lean streak of pork this fall. S. S.

Going to Make Matters Better?

The dispatches tell us that 91 head of Iowa steers sold at seven cents a pound, or $95 a head, in Chicago a few days ago. Getting the matter nearer home, the Keosauqua Republican says that John A. Ferguson of Van Buren county recently marketed 17 head of steers in Chicago which brought him $107.80 per head at seven dollars a hundred, while another bunch of 17 brought $6.80 a hundred. William Fritz, another farmer of the same county, recently sold a single wagon load of wool for $728.08. There was a time about 15 years ago when cattle and wool were doing pretty nearly as good as that. Along came a lot of fellows who were going to give the country something better if they could only get "a change." Enough of the people were fooled by their talk to bring about the change. The cattle fell to three dollars and four dollars a hundred, wool from 25 cents a pound to ten, and sheep from three dollars and four dollars a head to one dollar. And it took a long time to get prices back to those of the good old time. Now there is another lot of fellows, in these days of good prices for the farmer and general prosperity, telling how they are going to make matters better if they can cut down the tariff and give away home markets to the foreigner. How many of the people are going to be fooled this time?—Fairfield (Iowa) Ledger.

you only keep yer eyes skinned. If we kin only manage to hold 'em back till after dark we maybe might creep away through the bush to take a hand in this little game. Anyhow, it's up to us to play it out to the limit. Bless my eyes, if those lads ain't a-comin' up right now!"

A half-dozen men were starting to climb the hillside, fallowing a dim trail through the tangled underbrush. Mason stepped up to the ore dump where he could see better, and watched their movements closely.

"Hi, there!" he called, his voice harsh and strident. "You fellers are not invited to this picnic, an' there'll be somethin' doin' if you push along any higher."

The little bunch halted instantly just without the edge of the heavy timber, turning their faces up toward the speaker.

"Now, see here, Buck," answered one, taking a single step ahead of the others, and hollowing his hand as a trumpet to speak through, "it don't look to us fellers as if this affair was any of your funeral, nohow, and we've come 'long ahead of the others just on purpose to give you a fair show to pull out of it afore the real trouble begins. Sabe?"

"Is thet so?"

The little marshal was too far away for them to perceive how his teeth set beneath the bristly mustache.

"You bet! The boys don't consider thet it's hardly the square deal your takin' up agin 'em in this way. They 'lected you marshal of this yere camp, but it warn't expected you'd ever take no sides 'long with murderers. Thet's too stiff fer us to abide by. So come on down, Buck, an' leave us to attend to the cuss."

"If you mean Hampton, he's my prisoner. Will you promise to let me take him down to Cheyenne fer trial?"

"Wal, I reckon not, old man. We kin give him a trial well 'nough here in Glencaid," roared another voice from one of the group, which was apparently growing restless over the delay. "But we ain't inclined to do you

"Hi, There!" He Called, "You Fellers Ain't Invited to This Picnic."

no harm onless ye ram in too far. So come on down, Buck, throw up yer cards; we've got all the aces, an' ye can't bluff this whole durn camp."

Mason spat into the dump contemptuously, his hands thrust into his pockets. "You're a fine-lookin' lot o' law-abidin' citizens, you are! Blamed if you ain't. This yere man, Bob Hampton, is my prisoner, an' I'll take him to Cheyenne if I have ter brain every tough in Glencaid to do it. Thet's me, gents."

"Oh, come off; you can't run your notions agin the whole blame moral sentiment of this camp."

"Moral sentiment! I'm backin' up the law, not moral sentiment, ye cross-eyed beer-slinger, an' if ye try edgin' up ther another step I'll plug you with this '45.'"

There was a minute of hesitancy while the men below conferred, the marshal looking contemptuously down upon them, his revolver gleaming ominously in the light.

"Oh, come on, Buck, show a little hoss sense," the leader sang out. "We've got every feller in camp along with us, an' there ain't no show fer the two o' ye to hold out against that sort of an outfit."

Mason smiled and patted the barrel of his Colt.

"Oh, go to blazes! When I want any advice, Jimmie, I'll send fer ye."

Some one fired, the ball digging up the soft earth at the marshal's feet, and flinging it in a blinding cloud into Hampton's eyes. Mason's answer was a sudden fusilade, which sent the crowd flying helter-skelter into the underbrush. One among them staggered and half fell, yet succeeded in dragging himself out of sight.

"Great Scott, if I don't believe I winged James!" the shooter remarked cheerfully, reaching back into his pocket for more cartridges. "Maybe them boys will be a bit more keerful if they once onderstand they're up agin the real thing. Well, perhaps I better skin down, fer I reckon it's [illegible] fer de rifles now."

It was rifles next, and the "winging" of Big Jim, however it may have inspired caution, also developed fresh animosity in the hearts of his followers, and brought forth evidences of discipline in their approach. Peering across the sheltering dump pile, the besieged were able to perceive the dark figures cautiously advancing through the protecting brush; they sped out widely until their two flanks were close in against the wall of rock, and then the deadly rifles began to spit spitefully, the balls casting up the soft dirt in clouds or flattening against the stones. The two men crouched lower, hugging their pile of slag, unable to perceive even a stray assailant within range of their ready revolvers.

"This whole blame country is full of discharged sojers," he growled, "an' they know their biz all right. I reckon them fellers is pretty sure to git one of us yit; anyhow, they've got us cooped. Say, Bob, thet lad crawling yonder ought to be in reach, an' it's our bounden duty not to let the boys git too gay."

Hampton tried the shot suggested, elevating considerable to overcome distance. There was a yell and a swift skurrying backward which caused Mason to laugh, although neither knew whether this result arose from fright or wound.

"'Bliged ter teach 'em manners onct in awhile, or they'll imbibe a fool notion they kin come right 'long up yere without no invite. 'Taint fer long, nohow, 'less all them guys are ijuts."

Hampton turned his head and looked soberly into the freckled face, impressed by the speaker's grave tone.

"Why?"

"Fire, my boy, fire. The wind's dead right fer it; thet brush will burn like so much tinder, an' with this big wall o' rock back of us, it will be hell here, all right. Some of 'em are bound to think of it pretty blame soon, an' then, Bob, I reckon you an' I will hev' to take to the open on the jump."

Hampton's eyes hardened. God, how he desired to live just then, to uncover that fleeing Murphy and wring from him the whole truth which had been eluding him all these years!

CHAPTER XXI.

"She Loves Me; She Loves Me Not."

It was no claim of military duty which compelled Brant to relinquish Miss Spencer so promptly at the hotel door, but rather a desire to escape her ceaseless chatter and gain retirement where he could reflect in quiet over the revelations of Hampton. In this quest he rode slowly up the valley of the Bear Water, through the bright sunshine, the rare beauty of the scene scarcely leaving the slightest impress on his mind, so busy was it, and so preoccupied. He no longer had any doubt that Hampton had utilized his advantageous position, as well as his remarkable powers of pleasing, to ensnare the susceptible heart of this young, confiding girl. While the man had advanced no direct claim, he had said enough to make perfectly clear the close intimacy of their relation and the existence of a definite understanding between them. With this recognized as a fact, was he justified in endeavoring to win Naida Gillis for himself? That the girl would find continued happiness with such a man as Hampton he did not for a moment believe possible; that she had been deliberately deceived regarding his true character he felt no doubt. That the girl was morally so far above him as to make his very touch a profanation, and at the unbidden thought of it, the soldier vowed to oppose such an unholy consummation. Nor did he, even then, utterly despair of winning, for he recalled afresh the intimacy of their few past meetings, his face brightened in memory of this and that brief word or shy glance.

All the world loves a lover, and all the fairies guide him. As the officer's eyes glanced up from the dusty road, he perceived just ahead the same steep bank down which he had plunged in his effort at capturing his fleeing tormentor. With the sight there came upon him the desire to loiter again in the little glen where they had first met, and dream once more of her who had given to the shaded nook both life and beauty. He swung himself from the saddle, tied a loose rein to a scrub oak, and clambered up the bank.

With the noiseless step of a plainsman he pushed in through the labyrinths of bush, only to halt petrified upon the very edge of that inner barrier. No figment of imagination, but the glowing reality of flesh and blood, awaited him. She had neither seen nor heard his approach, and he stopped in perplexity. He had framed a dozen speeches for her ears, yet now he could do no more than stand and gaze, his heart in his eyes. And it was a vision to enchain, to hold lips speechless. She was seated with unstudied grace on the edge of the bank, her hands clasped about one knee, her sweet face sobered by thought, her eyes downcast, the long lashes plainly outlined against the clear cheeks. To draw back unobserved was impossible, even had he possessed strength of will sufficient to make the attempt, nor would words of easy greeting come to his relief. He could merely worship silently as before a sacred shrine. It was thus she glanced up and saw him with startled eyes, her hands unclasping, her cheeks rose-colored.

"Lieut. Brant, you here?" she exclaimed, speaking as if his presence seemed unreal. "What strange miracles an idle thought can work!"

"Thoughts, I have heard," he replied, coming toward her with head uncovered, "will sometimes awaken answers through vast distances of time and space. As my thought was with you I may be altogether to blame for thus arousing your own. From the expression of your face, I supposed you dreaming."

She smiled, her eyes uplifted for a single instant to his own. "It was rather thought just merging into dream, and there are few things in life more sweet. I know not whether it is the common gift of all minds, but my day-dreams are almost more to me than my realities."

"First is was moods, and now dreams." He seated himself comfortably at her feet. "You would cause me to believe you a most impractical person, Miss Naida."

"If that were only true, I am sure I should be most happy, for it has been my fortune so far to conjure up only pleasure through day-dreaming—the things I like and long for become my very own then. But if you mean, as I suspect, that I do not enjoy the dirt and drudgery of life, then my plea will have to be guilty. Back of what you term practical some one has said there is always a dream, a first conception. In that sense I choose to be a dreamer."

"And not so unwise a choice, if your dreams only tend toward results." He sat looking into her animated face, deeply puzzled by both words and actions. "I cannot help noticing that you avoid all reference to my meeting with Mr. Hampton. Is this another sign of your impractical mind?"

"I should say rather the opposite, for I had not even supposed it concerned me."

"Indeed! That presents a vastly different view from the one given us an hour since. The distinct impression was then conveyed to both our minds that you were greatly distressed regarding the matter. Is it possible you can have been acting again?"

"I? Certainly not!" and she made no attempt to hide her indignation. "What do you mean?"

He hesitated an instant in his reply, feeling that possibly he was treading upon thin ice. But her eyes commanded a direct answer, and he yielded to them.

"We were informed that you experienced great anxiety for fear we might quarrel—so great, indeed, that you had confided your troubles to another."

"To whom?"

"Miss Spencer. She came to us ostensibly in your name, and as a peacemaker."

For a moment she sat gazing directly at him, then she laughed softly.

"Why, how supremely ridiculous; I can hardly believe it true, only your face tells me you certainly are not in play. Lieut. Brant, I have never even dreamed of such a thing. You had informed me that your mission was one of peace, and he pledged me his word not to permit any quarrel. I had the utmost confidence in you both."

"How, then, did she even know of our meeting?"

"I am entirely in the dark, as mystified as you," she acknowledged, frankly, "for it has certainly never been a habit with me to betray the confidence of my friends, and I learned long since not to confide secrets to Miss Spencer."

Apparently neither cared to discuss the problem longer, yet he remained silent considering those questions which might decide his fate.

"You speak of your confidence in us both," he said, slowly. "To me the complete trust you repose in Mr. Hampton is scarcely comprehensible. Do you truly believe in his reform?"

"Certainly. Don't you?"

The direct return question served to nettle and confuse him. "It is, perhaps, not my place to say, as my future happiness does not directly depend on the permanence of his reformation. But if his word can be depended upon, your happiness to a very large extent does."

She bowed. "I have no doubt you can safely repose confidence in whatever he may have told you regarding me."

"You indorse, then, the claims he advances?"

"You are very insistent; yet I know of no good reason why I should not answer. Without at all knowing the nature of those claims to which you refer, I have no hesitancy in saying that I possess such complete confidence in Bob Hampton as to reply unreservedly yes. But really, Lieut. Brant, I should prefer talking upon some other topic. It is evident that you two gentlemen are not friendly, yet there is no reason why any misunderstanding between you should interfere with our friendship, is there?"

She asked this question with such perfect innocence that Brant believed she failed to comprehend Hampton's claims.

"I have been informed that it must," he explained. "I have been told that I was no longer to force my attentions upon Miss Gillis."

"By Bob Hampton?"

"Yes. These were, I believe, his exact words. Can you wonder that I hardly know how I stand in your sight?"

"I do not at all understand," she faltered. "Truly, Lieut. Brant, I do not. I feel that Mr. Hampton would not say that without a good and sufficient reason. He is not a man to be swayed by prejudice; yet, whatever the reason may be, I know nothing about it."

"But you do not answer my last query."

"Perhaps I did not hear it."

"It was: How do I stand in your sight? That is of far more importance to me now than any unauthorized command from Mr. Hampton."

She glanced up into his serious face shyly, with a little dimple of returning laughter. "Indeed; but perhaps he might not care to have me say. However, as I once informed you that you were very far from being my ideal, possibly it may be my duty to qualify that harsh statement somewhat."

"By confessing that I am your ideal?"

"Oh, indeed, no! We never realize our ideals, you know, or else they would entirely cease to be ideals. My confession is limited to a mere admission that I now consider you a very pleasant young gentleman."

"You offer me a stone when I cry unto your for bread," he exclaimed. "The world is filled with pleasant young men. They are a drug on the market. I beg some special distinction, some different classification in your eyes."

"You are becoming quite hard to please," her face turned partially away, her look meditative, "and—and dictatorial; but I will try. You are intelligent, a splendid dancer, fairly good looking, rather bright at times, and, no doubt, would prove venturesome if not held strictly to your proper place. Take it all in all, you are even interesting, and—I admit—I am inclined to like you."

The tantalizing tone and manner nerved him; he grasped the white hand resting invitingly on the grass, and held it firmly within his own. "You only make sport as you did once before. I must have the whole truth."

"Oh, no; to make sport at such a time would be sheerest mockery, and I would never dare to be so free. Why, remember we are scarcely more than strangers. How rude you are! only our third time of meeting, and you will not release my hand."

"Not unless I must, Naida," and the deep ringing soberness of his voice startled the girl into suddenly uplifting her eyes to his face. What she read there instantly changed her mood from playfulness to earnest gravity.

"Oh, please do not—do not say what you are tempted to," her voice almost pleading. "I cannot listen; truly I cannot; I must not. It would make us both very unhappy, and you would be sure to regret such hasty words."

"Regret!" and he yet clung to the hand which she scarcely endeavored to release, bending forward hoping to read in her hidden eyes the secret her lips guarded. "Am I, then, not old enough to know my own mind?"

"Yes—yes; I hope so, yes; but it is not for me; it can never be for me—I am no more than a child, a homeless waif, a nobody. You forget that I do not even know who I am, or the name I ought rightfully to bear. I will not have it so."

"Naida, sweetheart!" and he burst impetuously through all bonds of restraint, her flushed cheeks the inspiration of his daring. "I will speak, for I care nothing for all this. It is you I love—love forever. Do you understand me, darling? I love you! I love you!"

For an instant—one glad, weak, helpless, forgetful instant—she did not see him, did not even know herself; the very world was lost. Then she awoke as if from a dream, his strong arms clasped about her, his lips upon hers.

"You must not," she sobbed. "I tell you no! I will not consent; I will not be false to myself. You have no right; I gave you no right."

He permitted her to draw away, and they stood facing each other, he eager, mystified, thrilling with passion almost beyond mastery, she trembling and unstrung, her cheeks crimson, her eyes filled with mute appeal.

"I read it in your face," he insisted. "It told of love."

"Then my face must have lied," she answered, her soft voice tremulous, "or else you read the message wrongly. It is from my lips you must take the answer."

"And they kissed me."

"If so, I knew it not. It was by no volition of mine. Lieut. Brant, I have trusted you so completely; that was not right."

"My heart exonerates me."

"I cannot accept that guidance."

"Then you do not love me?"

She paused, afraid of the impulse that swept her on. "Perhaps," the low voice scarcely audible, "I may love you too well."

"You mean there is something—some person, perhaps—standing between?"

She looked frankly at him. "I do mean just that. I am not heartless, and I sincerely wish we had never met; but this must be the end."

The end? And with no explanation?"

"There is no other way." He could perceive tears in her eyes, although she spoke bravely. "Nor can I explain, for all is not clear to me. But this I know, there is a barrier between us insurmountable; not even the power of love can overcome it; and I appeal to you to ask me no more."

It was impossible for him to doubt her sober earnestness, or the depth of her feelings; the full truth in her words was pictured upon her face, and in the pathetic appeal of her eye. She extended both hands.

"You will forgive me? Truly, this barrier has not been raised by me."

He bowed low, until his lips pressed the white fingers, but before he could master himself to utter a word in reply, a distant voice called his name, and both glanced hastily around.

"That cry came from the valley," he said. "I left my horse tied there. I will go and learn what it means."

She followed him part of the way through the labyrinth of underbrush, hardly knowing why she did so. He stood alone upon the summit of the high bluff whence he could look across the stream. Miss Spencer stood below waving her parasol frantically, and even as he gazed at her, his ears caught the sound of heavy firing down the valley.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth Infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER II.—Hampton offers assistance to the girl, and is at first spurned because he is known as a gambler.

CHAPTER III.—Hampton and the girl only escape from the Indians. They fall exhausted on the plains.

CHAPTER IV.—A company of the Seventh cavalry, Lieut. Brant in command, find Hampton and the girl on the plains, and restore them to consciousness. Hampton announces that he proposes to care for the girl.

CHAPTER V.—Hampton and the girl stop at the Miners' Home in Glencaid, Mrs. Duffy, proprietess. Rev. Howard Wynkoop proposes that Hampton place Miss Gillis in care of Mrs. Herndon. He consents to think it over.

CHAPTER VI.—Hampton talks the future over with Miss Gillis—the Kid. She shows him her mother's picture and tells him what she can of her parentage and life. They decide she shall live with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VII.—The Kid takes up her residence with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VIII.—Naida—the Kid—runs away from Mrs. Herndon's and rejoins Hampton. He induces her to go back, and to have nothing more to do with him.

CHAPTER IX.—Hampton plays his last game of cards. He announces to Red Slavin that he has quit, and then leaves Glencaid.

CHAPTER X.—Miss Phoebe Spencer arrives in Glencaid to teach its first school.

CHAPTER XI.—Miss Spencer meets Naida, Rev. Wynkoop, etc. She boards at Mrs. Herndon's.

CHAPTER XIV.—Social difficulties arise at the Bachelor club's ball among the admirers of Miss Spencer. Lieut. Brant meets Miss Spencer but she is not his acquaintance of the day before. She tells him of Naida, and he accidentally meets her again as he is returning to the ballroom with a fan for Miss Spencer.

CHAPTER XV.—He fails to discover her identity.

CHAPTER XVI.—Brant accompanies Naida home from the dance. On the way she informs him as to who she is, and that she is to meet Hampton. Brant meets Hampton with her, and the men make an appointment to meet the following morning.

CHAPTER XVII.—Brant and Hampton meet. Hampton informs the lieutenant that his attentions to Naida must cease, and proclaims an authority over her that justifies the statement. Brant tells Hampton of the presence of Silent Murphy, and the fact that Red Slavin receives government messages for him.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Miss Spencer called on Bob Hampton. Tells him of a red-faced stranger mistaking her for Naida.

CHAPTER XIX.—Hampton interviews Red Slavin. Finds that he is an ex-trooper in the Seventh cavalry. It was Slavin's and Murphy's testimony that more than ten years before had convicted Robert Nolan, then a captain in the Seventh, of the murder of Maj. Brant, Sr. Hampton attempts to force a confession from Slavin. Slavin insists it is Murphy he wants, and Murphy has left. In a scuffle Slavin is killed by a knife thrust.

CHAPTER XX.—Hampton surrenders to Buck Mason, marshal. Mob attempts to capture him. Mason and his prisoner escape to a hill and defend themselves. Mob lights fire to burn them out.

Have Pursued a Practical Course.

The fact remains that the Republican party is the only one which has shown any ability to solve the problem of tariff legislation in harmony with the industrial growth of the country. The Democrats have tried upon several occasions to reach a solution, but their failure is easily accounted for by the fact that, as President Harriman said, they are "students of maxims rather than of markets."

Tariff reform cannot be successfully achieved in a student's closet. It is not the doctrinaire teacher of political economy in colleges or essay writer who is to blaze the way of revision along lines that will benefit instead of harm our industries. Before a solution of the right kind can be obtained the business men must be consulted, and whenever they are brought into the discussion the Democrats are compelled to retire.

The success of the Republicans in dealing with these matters is due to the fact that they have pursued a practical course. They have consulted the great commercial and manufacturing interests, and thereby they have promoted the welfare of the [illegible]

AN UNAUTHORIZED BATTLE.

Story of How Morgan, of Revolutionary Fame, Whipped a Teamster.

Not all orders to fight in time of war come from headquarters. Many a blow is struck for one's country of which no record finds its way to official reports. Such an engagement was that cited by Col. Crawford in his description of the "Expedition Against Sandusky." Crawford's company had prepared to march to join Washington's force, when proceedings were stopped from lack of transportation. Crawford happened to spy a civilian teamster who had stopped to rest and water his horses. In such an emergency the colonel felt no hesitancy in pressing the team into his service.

The owner, however, was in no humor to submit to what he considered an oppressive act. Things looked bad for him, for he was alone and in the midst of strong men. He remained for a time silent and sullen; then he observed that it was hard to be forced into service against his will. He said that the captain had taken advantage of circumstances, and that he would make a proposition.

"I will fight the captain or any other man in your company. If I am whipped I will go with you. If I conquer you must let me off."

The challenge was accepted and the man began to prepare. The colonel was throwing off his coat, when a tall young man stepped up. He had recently joined the company, and was a stranger to the other men. During the controversy with the teamster he had been leaning against a tree in apparent unconcern, but now he came forward and insisted on taking Crawford's place.

"You must let me fight that fellow," he said. "He will whip you. It will never do to allow the company to be beaten."

The young man gained his point, but the men of the company looked on rather dubiously. He was slender and pale, while the teamster was big and bluff, muscular and hardened by exposure, cool, defiant and confident. But when the young man threw his coat aside, he disclosed a framework of enormous bones and muscles, and the spirits of the company rose.

The contest was short and decisive. The teamster was completely vanquished. The victor, Morgan, afterward became the famous major general of revolutionary renown.

TOO MUCH FOR THE CHIEF.

Indian Could Not Stand the Firing of Mules at Him.

The Indian, solid as he looks, possesses a sense of humor which sometimes displays itself at unexpected times. Rev. Egerton R. Young gives an example of this in "Stories from Indian Wigwams." The tale was told to the author by Gen. Custer himself only a short time before Gen. Custer was killed.

Custer, following a band of hostile Indians, drove them up to a region of mountains and ravines. At one time he made an all-night march, and in the morning came upon a group of unsuspecting red men. The enemy was taken completely off guard, and without attempting to fight, fled, disappearing in the valley, and leaving Custer with little hopes of capturing any of them.

The general was at the top of a steep bluff, below which the Indians had retreated. The company had with them a small howitzer, carried on the back of a large mule. Custer ordered that this gun should be loaded while still on the animal, and fired down the side of the bluff, where the greatest number of the enemy had disappeared. For some reason or other the mule was dislodged by the concussion, lost its footing, and went crashing down the bluff into the undergrowth far below.

Meanwhile, troops had descended the other side of the bluff, and were searching the woods beneath. After a time they came back with a large number of Indians and one chief, known to be very warlike and cunning. Custer expressed his surprise to this chief, and asked him how he came to be captured.

"General," said the red man, "I am not afraid to fight men armed with bows and arrows, or with spears and tomahawks; and I love the battle with your soldiers armed with guns. You know I have not often been beaten. I have heard the roar of big guns and have not been afraid. But, general," here came a bit of a twinkle in his eye, "when you fired a whole mule at me, I said, 'It is time to surrender!'"

He and his men had been hiding in the underbrush at just the spot where the howitzer and the mule crashed through.

Fighting Blood in Her Family.

Mrs. Eliza Fish, aged 94, a wonderfully well preserved resident of Beverly, N. J., has had a great deal of fighting blood in her family. Both her grandfathers fought in the revolutionary war, her father and two brothers were in the war of 1812, her husband fought in Mexico, her three sons went through the civil war from start to finish, and when McKinley issued his call at the outbreak of trouble with Spain her grandson promptly went to the front.

Aristocratic Cattle Breeder.

Lord Rosebery seems to be as distinguished in stock breeding as in politics, literature and horse racing. There was much interest lately in the sale of 44 of his Jersey cows and heifers at Dairy farm, Mentmore, the highest price being $210, paid by Lord Rothschild.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE OLD NATIONAL ROAD

Was Original Plan to Make It Broad After Manner of Romans.

In the Youth's Companion, George Cary Eggleston gives an interesting account of the construction of the "National Road." Advocated urgently by George Washington, Congress begun the making of a great highway from the East to the new West.

The plan was to make the National Road a broad one, after the manner of the Romans, whose empire-building methods the statesmen of that time had minutely studied. The roadbed was sixty-six feet wide. The gradients were so low that a pair of horses might haul a very heavy load over them without difficulty. Every creek was well bridged and every brook culverted, while the surface of the road was made smooth with broken and pulverized stone.

This was in Maryland, Pennsylvania and Virginia. When the National Road had crossed the Ohio and entered the wilderness, a far less costly system of construction was adopted.

The road from Cumberland to Wheeling had cost six thousand dollars a mile, without counting the cost of bridges. From the Ohio River forward into the West, about three thousand dollars a mile—and much less as the road advanced—sufficed.

On the eastern division the road was paved six inches deep in broken stone; every little brook was bridged by a stone culvert, and every mile of the road was drained by two deep ditches, one on each side of it. West of the Ohio the only work done was to clear away the timber, grub up the stumps, and dig ditches. There was no thought of a stone coating to the roadway, and no thought of any thing else except to open a track over which wagons might be hauled through the mud.

Here and there in creek bottom lands the road was corduroyed. That is to say, timbers were laid upon its surface to keep the wagons from sinking hopelessly into the soil.

From Wheeling, in Virginia, it stretched in a very nearly straight line westward through the towns of Columbus, Ohio, Indianapolis, and Terra Haute, Indiana, to Vandalia, then the capital of Illinois.

Very early in the history of the road there were stage-coach lines set up, and taverns to accommodate the passengers. These taverns were usually double log cabins. There was in most of them one large room, with a great cavernous fireplace, and with little furniture of any kind.

In this room the male passengers slept upon pallets spread upon the floor. For the women another room was provided, with perhaps a trifle more of attention to comfort.

Upon rising in the morning the guests were expected to go out into the tavern yard to perform their ablutions. There was the well; there were tin basins to serve as washbowls, and there were towels—a very few—which were expected to serve the entire company. If a fastidious passenger wanted a clean towel, he had to get up early and do his washing while the common towel was still in its virgin freshness.

The food at these taverns was abundant, but simple. Pork, potatoes, and corn bread constituted it in the main. When a meal was ready there was a rush for the table, because those who got there first had their choice of things, while the belated ones had to be thankful for the leavings.

Men were accustomed to the simple life in those days, and even so distinguished a statesman as Henry Clay often traveled over the National Road, sleeping with the rest on a pallet, washing himself out in the yard, using the common jack-towel, and struggling on equal terms with the others for an early place at the table.

The stage coaches were at first run by individuals. After a while companies were formed, and after another period the big companies swallowed the little ones, and great through connecting lines were found, monopolizing the traffic and managing it. In their rivalry these companies gradually increased the speed till it became ten miles an hour, and a waybill is still in existence on which is written as an instructian to the stage driver, "If you can't make the speed ordered, we'll find somebody who can."

The traffic became so great at last that often twenty stage coaches were lined up at a single inn. Each coach carried nine passengers inside, one on the box, and as many more as choose to cling to the roof of the vehicle rather than wait for another coach.

The inns at which breakfasts were furnished usually provided for seventy passengers; and as there were often ninety or more hungry mouths to feed, it seems no wonder that there was a scramble for seats at the table.

Often there were robberies of the stage coaches. The coaches carried the mails, and in that early time, when checks and drafts were hardly known, people sent a good deal of money by the mail. In case of a stage-coach mail robbery every passenger was, of course, in danger; so every passenger carried his pistols with him.

Revolvers had not then been invented. Each pistol, after being fired once, had to be reloaded with powder and ball through its muzzle before it could be fired again. In view of this necessity, many passengers by the National Road stage coaches—men who carried large sums of money with them for the purchase of lands—armed themselves with a dozen or twenty pistols in a belt, and upon accasion used them all.

But the stage coach travel was the least of the traffic over the National Road. Great numbers of men went back and forth on horseback, carrying each a pair of saddle-bags as his only luggage.

Still more important was the wagon traffic. There were multitudes of emigrants who had loaded all they possessed in the world into canvas-covered wagons and had set out for the land of promise.

There were also great freight wagons, engaged in hauling goods westward for the storekeepers who had closely followed the emigrants, to sell in the new country. These freight wagons carried as many as eight-thousand pounds of fretght each, and each was drawn by four ar six horses.

Both the wagoners and the horses must be housed and fed on the journey, and for their accommodation wagon houses, as they were called, were set up along the road.

These wagon houses were often no more than a mile or two apart, and they did a thriving business. They had vast stables and still larger stable yards, where the horses could be curried, washed and shod, for there was a smithy at almost every one of them.

The accommodations of the men who drove the teams were far less elaborate. They were rough, hardy men, unused to luxury. They were satisfied with the coarsest food; if only there was enough of it to meet the excessive demands of their appetites, and usually they preferred to sleep in their own wagons, except when the weather was severely cold. They slept, as the most aristocratic stage-coach passenger did, at the inns upon pallets in a common room.

There were two things which the wagoners peremptorily demanded, and those two things every wagon house supplied. One was whiskey, and the other abundant fire.

It was in the wagon-houses along the National Road that coal, burned in grates, first came into general use. In the mountainous part of the road, where coal was abundant and cheap, there were grates in many of the wagon houses that would hold four bushels each. One such still exists, although nobody thinks of filling it now.

Farther west, where coal had not yet come into use, there were vast fireplaces eight or ten feet wide, four or five feet deep, and six or seven feet high.

Into these, huge backlogs were drawn by oxen or horses. On top of these backlogs—three or four feet in thickness—a second log a foot or two in diameter was placed, and a third of smaller dimensions, surmounted that. On the great andirons in front half a cord of wood was piled and fired. With such a fire going, even the largest and windiest of the wagon house rooms was made reasonably comfortable in the severest weather of the winter.

FOR ANOTHER AMENDMENT.

Democrats Will Submit One To The People.

Democratic leaders are agreed that as their party has a three-fifths majority in the Legislature now it is up to it to prepare a disfranchising amendment to be submitted to the peop'e, in accordance with the promise of their platform. The question they are puzzling over is how to prepare a measure that will disfranchise the negroes without disfranchising any white men.

To the new Attorney General, Mr. Isaac Lobe Straus, will be given the duty of preparing the original draft of the measure. Then it will be submitted to the party leaders and some Republicans, probably. If something can be figured out agreeable to all, it is thought that a majority for the measure can be got at the polls.

The Poe amentment was defeated by 34,000 votes. The Democratic leaders take that to mean that no proposal to give the registrars of election any extraordinary powers of discrimination will meet with approval. They are looking about for some other way of accomplishing their end.

Just now the talk centres largely around a property qualification, plus, of course, a grandfather's clause. If this principle is adopted, the law will provide something like this:

That any person who was entitled to vote on January 1, 1869, in Maryland or any other State of the Union, or any descendant of such person, shall be entitled to vote without further question.

That any foreign-born citizen of the United States naturalized on or before the date of the adoption of the new law, or any descendant of such person, shall be entitled to vote without further question.

That any person who has paid taxes on $300 worth of property for the preceding two years shall be entitled to vote.

Every citizen, in order to qualify as a voter, must come under some one of these three heads. It is recognized that this will not absolutely disfranchise all negro voters, as many of them pay taxes on the required amount of property. It also will disfranchise many foreigners who come to the State after the passage of the act. But this, it is thought, cannot be helped. An educational qualification which does not give large discriminating powers to the registrars is looked upon with disfavor, as a large proportion of the negroes in the State can both read and write.

BITTINGER.

The heavy and incessant fall of rain last week caused a considerable rise in the waters in this neighborhood and Sandy, who always gets his full share of life's trying experience, tells of his experience as follows: "I had an old sorrel-sided Jersey cow that wa'n't wuth the devil's fetchin', an' she war the most contrary critter ever let loose on a feller's tater patch, an' tother mornin' when I rid out ter fetch the cows I seed the river war high an' still gittin higher so I hustled round to the paster an' drive em in, but when I retch the river that plagued old Jersey wouldn't cross at the ford but tuk a fool notion ter try deep water on her own hook, so she curled her tail an' cantered right into the deepest place an' jist as she war about middle ways o' the stream a great hoss fly sot right down on the off side of her spinal column and tuk up a humstead claim. Ol' Jersey couldn't stand the assault on her carcass so she hove up to the wind and threw her head around to dislodge the varmit an' somehow got her foot tangled in her eye brow an' flopped over on her back. I seed she was goin' to drown, so I rid right in arter her and spittin' on my hands tuk hold on her tail thinkin' to haul her out, but the force of the current an' the heft of her carcass war too much and the tail parted from the rear of her anatomy an' the last I seed of the critter she war goin' down a bellerin'. I rid home an' hung the tail on the gate post, knowin' ef ever old sorrel-side teched dry land agin ef she had any common cow sense she would cum home arter it an' I didn't want to gin her any truble about findin' it. And now" said Sandy," turning to the loafers on the coal box in the corner, "if any o' you fellers see the aforesaid Jersey cow as you are paddlin' up salt river, I want you ter be kind to her an' tell her she kin cum home an' git forgiven, cause I never war a feller ter hold spite."

Of the 142 ballots cast in this district at the recent election held on Nov. 5th, but three were rejected, one for improper folding and two for improper marking. This is a very good showing, but there ought not to be any thrown out.

A party of our young people, Messrs. Amos Reckner, C. Buckle, C. Brenneman, Asa Bittinger and Leonard Stark, left this village last week for Crown Point, Fla., where they intend to spend the winter picking oranges.

Messrs. Patrick V. Laffey and John A. Beckman, of Frankville, were pleasant callers in this village last Monday.

Miss Emma McKenzie, of Pocahontas, Pa., was here on business last Monday.

Mrs. Shop, wife of Rev J. B. Shoup, started from here last week for her home in Fitzgerald, Ga. Mrs. Shoup was accompanied by her son and three grand children.

A. J. Oester made a business trip to Oakland last week.

KITZMILLERVILLE.

The teachers' institute held here Saturday, Nov. 9th, was not so large in numbers, but the interest manifested made up for all vacant seats. Those teachers within reach who failed to attend missed an enthusiastic meeting filled with inspiration for the teacher who is striving to lead his pupils to the heights of true education. Prof. Loraditch, president of the Teachers' Association, and Sup't. Browning, were present and rendered valuable aid. Both these men deserve praise for the efforts they are making along lines of institute work. This was the first institute ever held at Kitzmillerville, but it should not and must not be the last one. Several who were on the program made their appearance before an institute for the first time and their work was worthily done.

Mrs. H. A. Loraditch accompanied her husband to this place Saturday and spent a day or so with friends here.

Sheriff A. L. Lee was in town Saturday and attended the afternoon session of the institute.

Mr. Burns Lowdermilk, a teacher of Mt. Lake Park, attended institute and remained over until Sunday the guest of his friend, Wm. E. Bishoff.

Dr. B. F. Laughlin and wife, of Mt. Lake Park, spent several days last week visiting friends and relatives here. They expect to locate in Kingwood, W. Va., in the near future.

Senator W. McCulloh Brown, of Bayard, is here for a few days working on the location of a county road between this place and Dodson.

Rev. J. B. Workman, of Oakland, filled the place of elder and held quarterly meeting in the M. E. church here Saturday and Sunday. His work was well done, and we hope much good was accomplished.

We much regret to note the death of Mr. Edward McRobie, a young man who was killed in the mines near this town Monday. A large rock, weighing probably eight hundred pounds, fell on him while at work, crushing him very badly, and causing death within an hour or two of the accident. The deceased was of Bloomington. He was a steady worker and a very sincere Christian. Only the evening before his death he did his last public work for the Master, when he led the devotional service of the Epworth League, and at the close of the preaching service, offered up a most earnest prayer to God.

That the said defendants are non-residents of the State of Maryland.

The bill prays for the sale of said property, and that the proceeds be distributed among the parties according to their respective rights and interests, and general relief, and an order of publication against non-resident defendants and unknown heirs.

It is thereupon, this 14th day of October, 1907, ordered by the Circuit Court for Garrett county, in Equity, that the plaintiffs by causing a copy of this order to be inserted in some newspaper published in said Garrett county, once in each of four successive weeks before the 16th day of November, 1907, give notice to said absent defendants and the unknown heirs of Grace Mutler and Lewis Lish of the object and substance of this bill warning them to appear in this Court, in person or by solicitor, on or before the 2nd day of December, next, to show cause, if any they have, why a decree ought not to be passed as prayed.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1907. NUMBER 38

THE DEMOCRATS MUST SHOULDER ALL BLAME

Republicans Will Not Be Responsible For Legislation

AS TO BUSINESS INTERESTS.

Maryland Institutions Expect to Be Protected by General Assembly. Argue That Untimely Interference May Affect Revenue of The State.

With only a handful of members in either house of the General Assembly, the Republicans will be unable to exercise any influence in the enactment of legislation. The Democrats have an overwhelming majority and can, therefore, pass or defeat any measures they are called upon to consider. There will be 9 Republicans in the Senate and 26 in the House of Delegates, giving the Democrats a majority of 58 on joint ballot.

When, therefore, political measures are under consideration, the Republicans, being in a hopeless minority, can only protest, should these be unfair. The Democrats are no doubt prepared to assume responsibility for all such legislation, but the Republicans will see to it that they are also held accountable for the enactment of laws which are nonpolitical, and there promises to be quite a number of such measures of greater or less importance.

As a rule party lines are ignored when bills of this description are discussed, and not infrequently the minority decide their fate. If these laws prove satisfactory the dominant party claims, and is accorded, all the credit, notwithstanding they were passed by Republican votes. Should they, on the other hand, not fulfil expectations, the majority must shoulder all the blame. As the Democrats control absolutely they are responsible not only for the mistakes of the members of their own party, but for those of the Republicans as well.

The Democratic party leaders are well aware of the danger of allowing the inexperienced representatives to legislate as they please and so far as lies in their power will hold a tight rein on them. The average new member usually comes to Annapolis with a fad which if put into operation would, in his judgment, work out the salvation of the people. Sometimes his bills have merit, but as a rule they are radical and harmful and, therefore, must be squelched. If two-thirds of the remedial bills brought to Annapolis were passed the code at the close of the session would look like a crazy-quilt and the judges become distracted in trying to construe the conflicting laws.

Already some of the young lawyers are breaking loose. They are heralding the reformatory legislation they intend to put through regardless of the opinions of the bench and bar, whose indorsements they regard as unnecessary. By the time these bills come back from committee, is they are returned at all, most of them will read very differently, and even then their passage is doubtful.

Indeed, if the influence of the party managers counts for anything, there will be comparatively few changes made in the laws of the state, especially in those affecting the business interests. There appears to be a disinclination to do anything that may hamper the operations of corporations because of the financial stringency. The conditions are such that any restrictive legislation at this time might work damage to the city and state by decreasing the revenue and throwing out of employment those dependent upon the institutions affected.

This applies particularly to Baltimore corporations which contribute largely to the maintainance of the municipal government, directly and indirectly. With the finances of the country in good shape and everything working smoothly no objections could be raised, except probably by the corporations affected, to any legislation which is intended to jack them up and improve conditions. But at this time, when the finances of the country are in a chaotic state, the moneyed interests stoutly oppose any legislation of this character except such as will not affect the work of the institution at whom it is directed.

Then, again, it is argued the city cannot afford any reduction in its revenues. The vast and important improvements now under way must not be disturbed. A curtailment of the receipts of any of the industries which pay tribute to the municipality must necessarily affect the income of the city and also of the state.

All of the business interests intend to urge upon the political leaders of both parties what they term the unwisdom of untimely legislation, and they hope by concerted action to prevent its enactment. If their efforts bear fruit no bills will be considered which will interfere with any of the varied business interests.

So far as in their power lies, the Republican leaders will protect all interests from improper legislation. They will advocate proper supervision, but will not favor any measures that would tend to cripple them and impair their usefulness. They pleaded for a square deal prior to the election, and had it been accorded them the interests of the city and state, as well as those of private corporations, would undoubtedly have been safeguarded. Whether the Democrats with their unwieldy majority can steer their people into safe waters remains to be determined. It is up to them.

The Republican minority in the Senate will probably to led by Mr. Willliam B. Baker, of Harford, whose experience as a legislator and whose conservatism make him a wise counselor. Nearly all of the Republican senators are men of affairs, thoroughly conversant with the state's needs and can be depended upon to do their part to secure proper legislation.

In the House of Delegates the leadership will probably devolve upon Mr. James E. Godwin, who is now about to serve a third term and is well qualified to direct the minority. He will be aided by such veterans as William Harry Pairo, and John J. Stump and David E. Dick, of Allegany. Owing to the small number of Republicans in the House the party will not be largely represented on the committees, but in the deliberations in open session they may be expected to take a leading part.

It is the purpose of the minority to offer, among other reform measures, a new election law, probably that framed by the Reform League. This, if adopted, would be entirely acceptable, as it insures fair elections. There is little hope of the Democrats accepting this bill, which is altogether too fair to suit their purposes. They know that the change proposed would enable every citizen to vote and to have that vote counted, and as they could not win if such a law was passed they will turn it down.

About the only change they, it is thought, will agree to is to have the intent of the voter considered in the count, and perhaps to agree to pass the group of candidates for any one office when the voter did not mark properly and allow the judges to count all the others. Even then it is doubtful whether this improvement will extend to those counties to which the Wilson Law applies.

There has been some talk about changing the representative in the window, so as to give the dominant party a majority of the judges. It is doubtful, however, whether the Democrats will go quite that far. Still, it is possible, in view of the fact that at the next general election they propose to submit another disfranchising amendment, which they will try to force through in spite of the tremendous opposition. It would be an easy matter to count in not only their candidates, but the disfranchising scheme. The expense attached to such a proceeding would not be so great as that entailed at the recent election, when money was used on weak officials.

The fact that men who were trusted proved disloyal was not the fault of the organization leaders. In selecting an army of officials the management is obliged to depend in great measure upon the judgment of the men down the line. These did the best they could, and in the best interests of the party, but in some instances the temptation was too strong and the weak ones succumbed. Had the conditions been reversed and the Republicans been in position to use the same tactics employed by the opposition, they could, had they been so disposed, returned a majority for their candidates.

Complimentary to Mr. P. J. Stephen.

In local revolutions incident to election changes and disturbance, much frequently occurs, either through personal or official reasons, to be vewed with regret.

For so long a while Mr. Peter J. Stephen has been a prominent member of the Garrett Board of County Commissioners as to leave his individuality visibly impressed upon the organization and his methods well worked in every department of its proceedings.. During the greater part of the term of his election and re-elections, be has served as presiding officer of the Board with a high purpose of fairness to every interest concerned and with unquestioned fidelity to the best protection of the county's rights; and he now leaves a finished record that should be no less acceptable to a grateful people than gratifying to himself.

Mr. Stephen in the arduous demands and ceaseless test of this exacting trust has shown himself an honest, clear-minded and diligent public servant, and Garrett should treasure his memory among the most dutiful and respected of those who have best observed her rights and honored her name. By virtue of his office Mr. Stephen was also a member of the Court House Commission and when at the last meeting of that Board his retirement was stated, the Chairman, Judge Henderson, spoke in commendatory terms and feelingly expressed the Board's loss.

THE FAR-FAMED ALTAMONT SPRINGS WATER

Being Shipped in Car Load Lots To Eastern Cities.

DESCRIPTION OF BOTTLING WORKS

Everything Appertaining to The Handling of The Water Is Scrupulously Clean and Contamination Is Almost Absolutely Impossible.

Garrett county, Maryland, has long had the reputation of possessing, among other things, abundance of good pure water, and now that the Altamont Spring Water Company has taken the initiative in bottling and shipping it away, the people of this section of Maryland feel that a new and important industry has been set on foot.

When Col. George Truesdell, former District Commissioner of Washington city, because the owner of the Altamont Springs farm, he found several springs of water of remarkable purity. He at once began shipping the water, in limited quantities to Washington, and it has become quite noted there and in Philadelphia and Baltimore.

One of these springs known as Altamont Spring on Great Backbone Mountain, 3000 feet above the sea, is a spring of large proportions and icy temperature. The demand for the Altamont Spring water has induced the proprietor to build a stone house over the spring, and erect a barbed wire fence about it, so that no possible contamination should result. This water has been piped to the Altamont Springs Farm station on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and a building erected for the bottling and shipping of this product.

The building was begun in 1905 and completed in the early part of the present year. It has a frontage on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad of forty feet, with a depth of eighty feet. It has two stories, the first story being of concrete. The machinery is of the very latest manufacture, and the building contains every possible improvement that can be thought of. There are four storage rooms, two of them with a ten foot ceiling, and two with a heighth of fourteen feet. A siding, with a car capacity of four cars, has been put in place by the Railroad Company.

Absolutely nothing is done to the water, but everything to the bottles. The machinery for cleansing, washing, sterilizing and labeling the bottles is of the very best, and that cleanliness may prevail throughout the establishment, rubber gloves are provided for the operators at the sterilizing machines, and on the first floor, bath rooms, with all modern innovations, for the male employes, and similar accommodations on the second floor for the female employes have been installedin accordance with the rigid rule for absolute cleanliness throughout the works.

Owing to the inability to sterilize the five gallon carboys formerly in use, on account of uneven thickness of the glass, and unequal expansion and contraction when subjected to extreme heat, that form of vessel has been abandoned, and only half gallon size bottles used. While the machinery was fully capable of sterilizing the carboys, they themselves could not stand the uneven expansion and contraction due to the excessive heat, and subsequent cooling incident to the process. Half gallon bottles, on the contrary, stand the high degree of temperature very well.

Each case contains twelve half gallon bottles. The stoppers used are the familiar crowns manufactured by the Crown Cork and Seal Company of Baltimore, used extensively on all bottles throughout the country.

The boxes containing the empty bottles received from the B. and O. cars at the building platform, are brought to the ground floor by an elevator, where they are placed on a gravity conveyor to the ponderous steel soaking machine, that revolves once every thirty-two minutes. This soaking machine has eight hundred pockets with capacity for as many bottles, and one hour is consumed in the soaking process of these eight hundred bottles. The soaking machine holds 4 thousand gallons. It is divided into two compartments, and both of these compartments are filled with a solution of caustic soda. The first solution is strong, and the next weaker, and during the passage of the bottles through the soaking machine, 32 minutes are consumed, during which time the bottles are automatically filled and emptied twice.

After passing through the soaking machine, the bottles are automatically dumped into a tank of warm spring water, where the outside of the bottle is thoroughly washed and rinsed from the caustic soda. Then they are put into a washing machine with a rubber brush placed inside of each bottle, having a revolution of 1800 times per minute, touching every part of the same. Then each bottle is carefully examined, and placed on a rinsing machine and thoroughly rinsed for a second time, by pure spring water, under high pressure.

The sterilizing machines hold sixty-nine bottles each, and the bottles are subjected to a steam bath for 20 minutes, at a temperatvre of about 221 degrees; then boiling water is turned on in the inverted bottles in the sterilizer. There is thus no possibility of the retention of germs in a bottle after all this is gone through. The operators in removing the bottles from the copper sterilizer use rubber gloves while so engaged, on all occasions. These rubber gloves are never omitted.

The bottles, after the sterilizing process, are kept in an inverted position, so os to keep the sterile air in them until filled, and the air driven out by the water direct from the spring. After the bottles are removed from the copper sterilizers by the rubber gloved employes, each bottle is placed in the filling machine where the force of the spring water drives the warm sterile air upward, the water and the gases of the spring taking its place, when it is immediately capped by a crown, cork and seal cap.

The purest water on earth placed in bottles that have not been properly and thoroughly sterilized, are likely to produce dirty water, and possibly convey the germs of a deadly disease. Any water placed in a bottle that has not been sterilized is a menace to the public health.

The big soaking machine was manufactured and set up by a St. Louis firm. It is the most expensive and efficient machine known at the present day for soaking and cleansing bottles.

The sterilizers of heavy copper were built from a special design and specification furnished by Col. Truesdell, and are not in use elsewhere. They are marvels of beauty and efficiency.

There is no known method of sterilizing properly, except by intense heat.

The bottled water is sent away in car load lots to Washington, Baltimore and Philadelphia, and its early introduction into other large cities anticipated. The sterilizing is done under a pressure of five pounds to the square inch.

The bottling building is practically fireproof, and is the first building in Garrett county to be erected so near the fire proof line. An additional building has been erected near by on the same plot of ground, 24 by 60 feet, to meet the expanding business.

An interesting innovation is the great care exercised in providing a complete system of ventilation, by means of flues carrying off the air from the interior of the building, fresh air being drawn from the outside through cheese cloths placed in the ventilators.

Dr. H. B. McConnell, of the Chemical Department of the Maryland Agricultural College, has made an inspection of the bottling plant, and reports its equipment elaborate and perfect in all its details.

AN EGREGIOUS ERROR

A Correspondent Corrects It However, Even If It Did Escape the Proof-reader.

SWANTON, MD., Nov. 15, 1907.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I noticed a typographical error in my article in favor of a "Soldiers' Monument" in THE REPUBLICAN of yesterday. In my article I ask "Will not THE REPUBLICAN take this matter up and help create public sentiment in favor of the monument." Instead of THE REPUBLICAN, as it was intended, we find the printer makes it "The Republicans" which we did not and do not mean.

This is patriotic work and politics has nothing to do with it.

We are sure that men and women of all political parties and religious creeds will be willing to do their part to help erect the monument in honor of our country's defenders and I am sure that I would be the last man to try to make this important patriotic work the work of any political party.

I want to see the monument erected but I want to see it done by the people of our county regardless of politics or religious creed.

I have thought quite a good deal of this matter. Many a time while working the west when I visited the county seats of many of the counties and saw the fine monuments erected in honor of the soldiers and sailors who did so much for our country I determined that I would do what I could towards having a monument erected in Oakland in honor of the heroes of the Civil and Spanish-American wars.

I would like to see this done. I am not narrow enough to want the Republicans alone to do this work. I do not want any politics in this matter but let us all do what we can in this patriotic work.

We know that you, Mr. Epitor, will do what you can through THE REPUBLICAN to create a sentiment in favor of the erection of a fine monument to be dedicated next Fourth of July.

Very truly,
A. F. GEORGE.

In Another Light.

By Minnie Nelson Hinds.

Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.

"Same old story," said the young man bitterly as he gazed at the little gold circle in his big brown palm. The diamond seemed to twinkle at him "all is over" as he lifted his glance to the mutinous, fascinating little figure before him.

"Given one unreasonable woman, a lover who refuses to be a doormat, engagement at an end, man is politely requested to make himself scarce, and," he added in sarcastic tones, "there doesn't seem to be anything else for him to do."

The girl with the gentian blue eyes smoothed the lovelocks that would escape and settled her back comb firmly as she replied succinctly, "You are selfish."

"Selfish?" he snapped. "You know that Jack is in love with you."

"Nonsense!" answered Elsa, forgetting herself and allowing a shadow of a dimple to appear. "Here are the facts of the case: You are going away for a month, and Doris has invited me to her house party. You object because she has a good looking"—with a sly glance from under the long black lashes—"brother and expect me to stay at home like a man. I just won't do it," she finished emphatically.

"Very well," said Ned firmly, though a white line formed around his well cut lips. "I am glad to know what a woman's love consists of." Disdainfully, yet longingly, he looked at the top of Elsa's pretty head with its coronet braid of soft brown hair. She was a most desirable vision, and his heart beat fast. How could he give her up? Jealous? Yes, he was. But who would blame him? The thought of Elsa living in the same house with fascinating Jack Denton for a month was more than he could stand. In his mind's eye he could see that fellow eternally at her side leaning over the piano and gazing devotedly into Elsa's eyes as she sang, while his glance conveyed unutterable things floating down the river in the still cool shadows, while Jack read his latest fad in poets, motoring in his new car, confound him! Decidedly Ned felt that he was justified, and Elsa had no right to torture him.

"GIMME THEM STONES QUICK."

"You are sure that your decision is final?" asked Ned coldly.

"Quite," replied the girl, with a finality in her tone.

Ned dropped the ring carelessly into his pocket, lifted his hat formally and turned away in silence.

Elsa walked slowly along the rose bordered path toward the house.

"I'm glad of it," she said to herself defiantly. "I won't cry." The tears rolled down her flushed cheeks. "There isn't a man living worth crying for," she dashed them away scornfully. "I wonder if he will go to Denver just the same."

Ned's uncle was the head of a big manufacturing concern, and his dearest wish was to let Ned step into his shoes when he "made good," as he phrased it. Ned had done well, and now had come the chance to prove whether he could handle the big trade in the west.

"Only a month," said Ned as he strode away. "She knows just how much it means to us. Oh, I forgot; there isn't any 'us' now. Well, she never could have cared or she would have given in."

Ned packed his grip that night with a firm determination never to come back east again. He had intended taking the 6 o'clock train, but—"I may as well see her once more," he said to himself miserably. "It will be the last time."

Meanwhile Elsa was listlessly dressing for the last dance of the season.

"Ned has gone, and I may as well go enjoy myself," she soliloquized as she gloomily patted and pulled a princess gown of daffodil liberty about her dainty figure.

"I shall not tell any one yet," she sighed as she opened her jewel case and took out its choicest treasure. This consisted of a necklace composed of tiny beads of beaten gold. Across the front five flawless sapphires alternated with four diamonds of purest water. The effect of this combination on Elsa's Christy throat was all that could be desired.

As she waited for the carriage in the hall she threw back her coat and gave a last glance at herself in the long mirror. "It certainly fits," she said critically. "I wish Ned could see it."

A shadow darkened the glass. Ere she could turn cold steel touched her cheek, and a hoarse voice said: "Gimme them stones quick. Don't holler or I'll plug yer, see?" and a hairy hand fumbled with the neck of her wrap.

The girl's horrified gaze took in the creature behind her. The dryness of her throat told her that she had lost the power to scream even had she dared. The man would certainly kill her. His villainous face told its own tale. She threw up her hands to ward the man away as she gasped, "Oh, don't touch me, and I'll give it to you!"

How she hated to give up her precious chain. There was no way out of it. Their only maid had retired early with the toothache, father and mother were at the theater, and the carriage had been sent for her chaperon. She was utterly alone. Fumbling desperately with the clasp, she suddenly felt the floor rising and swaying away from the burglar. She toppled to the rug in a faint.

Ere the man could stoop to the prostrate figure there was a crash at the big hall window, and Ned sprang through the splintered points from the piazza. A long reach, a scientific blow with a big fellow's full weight behind it, and the burglar was crumpled up in the corner.

"He won't come out of that right away," said Ned as he searched the man and pocketed his revolver.

Elsa came back to consciousness under a shower of half frightened kisses.

"Darling, darling! Did he hurt you?" demanded Ned as she clung desperately to him.

"No, but those dreadful eyes," she shivered. "Mercy!" as she caught sight of the huddled figure. "Is he dead, Ned?"

"Not he," said Ned contemptuously. "They're tough."

"Oh, do get him out of the way quick, Ned," sobbed the unstrung girl. "He might hurt you. Call the police quick."

Ned rang up the station with a hurry call, and after he had closed the door on the officers with their still unconscious captive he turned his attention to soothing Elsa.

That he succeeded well was proven [illegible] the admiring glance that Elsa fastened on the erstwhile lonely diamond [illegible] she said, "Oh, weren't you brave, Ned?"

"A gun is no good against a knock-out when you see your man first," replied Ned, with a grin.

"You may be domineering," said Elsa mischievously, "but you'll be a good protection against burglars anyway."

"Perhaps you had better hurry up and secure me," replied the young man, with an emphasizing embrace.

A Gossiping Neighbor.

Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. Adams were exchanging confidences over the line fence that separated their back yards. "Who are those people that have moved into the house on the other side of you?" said Mrs. Adams. "Judging from the looks of their furniture, I don't think they amount to much."

"Their name is Monroe," answered Mrs. Harrison. "I don't know them, but I've heard of them. The man works in a photograph gallery. They've got four children, a dog and a canary bird.

"Their window shades don't fit, and they've tacked up papers to keep people from looking in.

"I guess they haven't much money. I heard the man tell the driver of the moving wagon that he'd pay him next week.

"The oldest boy is cross eyed and has red hair. The youngest one is a regular imp. Goes around with one of her stockings hanging loose and slides down the back stairway.

"The woman has a fierce temper and boxes the children's ears. And that isn't the worse of it," added Mrs. Harrison, lowering her voice. "They say the way she gossips is just awful! I don't think I shall have anything to do with her."—Youth's Companion.

The Broken Window.

An iron hoop bounced through the railings and played havoc with the kitchen window. With a fighting look in her eye the lady of the house awaited the appearance of the hoop's owner. Presently he came.

"Please, ma'am, I've broken your window," he said, "and 'ere's father to mend it." And, sure enough, he was followed by a stolid looking man, who at once started work, while the small boy ran off with the hoop.

"That'll be two and threepence," announced the glazier when the window was whole once more.

"Two and threepence!" gasped the lady. "But your little boy broke it—the little fellow with the hoop, you know. You're his father, arn't you?"

The stolid man shook his head. "Don't know him from Adam," he said. "He came round to my place and told me his mother wanted her winder mended. You're his mother, ain't you?"—Liverpool Mercury.

Ancient Playing Cards.

The ancient Tarot packs were the earliest playing cards known to our forefathers. They consisted of seventy-two, seventy-seven or seventy-eight cards. These cards are still used in remote parts of Italy, France and Switzerland and are made in Florence, the designs being handed down from generation to generation.

NOTES FROM MEADOWBROOK FARM

By William Pitt

Clean water makes sweeter pork.

For light driving the small horse is better than the large.

Study the weeds on your farm and find how best to get rid of them.

Breed to a purpose. Indifference in this matter leads to indifferent results.

The farmer can best look after his bank account by studying the needs of his live stock.

Pigs which have grass with the grain ration will fatten faster than those not so fed.

Plow all sweet clover roots off good this fall and you will have none to bother you next spring.

The increasing demand each year for fruit is emphasizing the importance of putting more land into such culture.

There is no indication that there will be over-production of apples this year either. Plant that orchard, brother; plant that orchard!

Tar roofing paper will make a fairly good lining for a silo. Covered with a thin sheeting of wood improves the silo and makes the lining permanent.

What shall it profit the farmer if he work all summer to grow some succulent root crops and then in the fall neglecteth to properly store the fruits of his labor?

The Farmers' National congress is to meet at Oklahoma City, Okla., on October 17. Such gatherings of farmers means much to the progress of agriculture in this country.

Don't rush the horse down hill. It is not only dangerous, but makes the horse nervous, besides weakening the tendons of the legs and is apt to spring the knees out of shape.

Feed roots, such as beets, turnips and mangels, freely after removing the cows from the pasture this fall. They will keep up the milk supply better and come out in better condition next spring.

Clover hay is good for pigs and hogs in the fall and winter. If the clover is small, it will be the more readily eaten. The aftermath of clover makes a good hay for hogs and can be fed without chopping.

Diversions and novelties and entertainments are all right at the agricultural show, but the management of such affairs should see that such attractions do not eclipse the real purposes for which the fair was held.

Ventilataion is one of the chief needs of the poultry house and now is the time to give the matter thought. Do not go into another winter without seeing that proper methods of providing fresh air for your chickens is provided.

An obstinate horse can be easily bridled and made to take the bit if the finger or thumb is pushed into the corner of his mouth and his tongue touched. Hold the bridle with the right hand, so that the bits are just in front of his lips and rest upon the back of the left hand near the wrist. Stick your left forefinger into the corner of his mouth, and as he opens it pull the bits into his mouth by slipping the headgear over his ears.

A dozen different conditions may give rise to tainted milk, as foul air in barn; cows lying in manure; rusty milk tins, sick cows and udder diseases; putting fresh and old milk in the same cans; unwholesome or strong smelling fodder and foods; failure to cool milk immediately after milking; impure water for washing utensils, or impure dirty water for the cows to drink; uncleanly milking, manure particles dropping from udder; keeping milk too long in stable before removing to milk room; lack of cleanliness in the care of the milk.

Tests at the South Dakota experiment station show that one and one-fourth pounds of speltz equals one pound of corn for steer feeding. Where corn and speltz are mixed half and half by weight, slightly better results are obtained. The advantage of using the grains at home is also in favor of its being fed to cattle or swine. In the test mentioned, the steers fed on speltz did not consume as much hay per pound or gain as those fed upon other grains, which shows that the husk of speltz is a substitute for hay to a considerable degree. It produces a firm flesh much the same as the oats and as good quality of meat as corn.

Whitewa[illegible] before the cold weather [illegible]

Mended clothes and bills all paid are better than new clothes on credit.

Rye adds no plant food to the soil and hence has no value as green manure.

Feed the coarse fodder with the small feed so as to maintain the balance in the ration.

Cool the cream immediately after it comes from the separator. It will make the butter better.

Wife will thank you for your thoughtfulness in sharpening scissors and the kitchen knives.

Wheat-bran middlings roots and grass make a good ration for the pigs selected as breeders. Notice that we omitted corn.

There is economy in buying the best made machine or tool. But remember after you have bought it to take good care of it.

The earth of the chicken pen floors is as rich as many brands of fertilizers. Get it out on the land and put in fresh dirt. It will be better for the chickens and better for you.

Stop that little gully in the field which opened up with the last rain. It is easier to fix now than after the next rain or two have made the breech infinitely larger.

Make a difference between the feeding of the pigs that are to become breeders and those you are fattening for market. Overfatness must be avoided with the former.

If the pasturage is dry and the feed poor, one stalk of corn in the silk is worth more to the cows now than the ear that the stalk can produce will be worth next winter.

Store the oily feeds where they will not become contaminated by foul odors. Feed thus affected is more than apt to taint the milk and carry the cowy flavor to the butter.

Don't be content to do anything but the best type of farming. Be on the watch for new ideas. If your neighbor's methods are better than your own, do not be too proud to say so, but adopt them. If you have an idea or method which will help your neighbor, see that he gets it. Help others and help yourself.

In taking the stock in from off the pasture this fall remember that the change from field where much exercise is obtained to the stall is quite severe. For this reason the cows should be allowed as much freedom as possible in the yards about the barn. They should be put in the barn only when the weather is bad or at milking time.

In the cutting down of small trees farmers often rob themselves of larger profit later on. Arboriculture tells of an incident in Virginia. Ten years ago about 64,000 young hickory trees were cut down to provide hickory hoops for about 13,000 apple barrels. The barrel hoops had been sold for about $400. If the trees had been allowed to grow, they would have been big enough in a few years for cutting up into carriage spokes, and would have produced, at the present price of $35 a thousand, spokes worth more than $800,000. This is the kind of forestrry argument that ought to appeal to owners of brush lots.

Make your own vinegar on the farm. Only sound, ripe apples should be used, avoiding dirty fruit or washing it before pressing. Use only juice from the first pressing, place in clean barrels which have been treated with hot water or steam to destroy undesirable germs. The barrels should not be full, nor tightly corked, as free access of air is desirable. In ordinary temperatures, the first stage, the alcoholic fermentation, should be complete in five or six months; but by storing in warmer rooms, and by the use of yeast, can be much shortened. The second stage, the acetic fermentation, may be hastened by heat and by the use of a good "starter" of "mother" or sharp vinegar. When the required acidity is reached, the barrels should be filled to the bung and tightly corked to avoid undesirable fermentations.

Pinstch oil, the residue left in the cylinders used to contain the gas for lighting railway coaches, and which can be obtained for about 25 cents per gallon in small quantities, is recommended by the Colorado experiment station as a good substitute for carbon-bisulphide in exterminating prairie dogs, gophers, rabbits, or any ground burrowing pests. The following directions are given for applying the remedy. Three hands and a boy will accomplish the best results. Armed with a can of Pinstch oil and quantities of cow or horse chips the party proceeds to the dog town. One man goes in advance and with a shovel puts a clod in each hole not occupied by dogs. The next man saturates a chip with two or three teaspoonfuls of oil and drops it into the hole, pushing it far back with a stick. The third man immediately fills the mouth of the hole tightly with earth. Pinstch oil is very volatile, and where the vapors are mixed with air will explode with violence if a spark of any kind reaches it. It is unsafe to smoke or strike a match while working with it.

ALL DUE TO PROTECTION.

Prosperity in the Past Has Had But One Source.

In an address at Marshfield, Mass., August 22, Congressman McCall said:

"We are pretty near the edge of a financial setback. Economically an industrial crisis at this time would be senseless and wanton, but we should already have had one if our prosperity had not been well nigh invulnerable."

What was it that in the past ten years has made our prosperity well nigh invulnerable?

Production at the maximum and consumption keeping pace with production.

Abundance of employment at the highest wages ever known.

Liberal buying by wage earners at prices remunerative to both manufacturer and merchant.

A money market kept steady by favorable trade balances averaging close to half a billion dollars a year.

These were the prime factors of our rock-rooted prosperity.

What has shaken the foundations of that prosperity?

An insane rage for the disturbance of sound economic laws and ideal economic conditions, coupled with ill-judged fulminations against "predatory wealth," and no word of reproach for predatory political wreckers of business stability.

Foolish and probably unlawful "trade agreements" designed to take work and wages away from American labor and hand them over to foreigners.

Concerning which Congressman McCall might truthfully say: "All of which I saw and part of which I was."

How Cuban Reciprocity Works.

The round-up of trade with Cuba for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, does not show well for the wisdom which opened the door to a market of 85,000,000 consumers, the most liberal on earth, in return for some few extra privileges in a market of less than 2,000,000 of relatively small consumers.

Even as a proposition in philanthropy our reciprocity experiment with Cuba has not been a shining success. Briefly stated, our generosity in allowing the Cubans a rebate of tariff payments on their exports of sugar, tobacco and a few other things represents a money loss to this country of rather more than $66,000,000 a year.

In 1907 we bought of Cuba products worth $97,441,690, and we sold to Cuba our products to the value of $48,330,913.

The difference between our sales to and our purchases from Cuba was $49,111,777. Close upon $50,000,000 went out of our money supply and was used by Cuba in purchasing from foreign countries commodities which for the most part Cuba could, had she felt so inclined, have bought in the United States.

Then, too, on that nearly $98,000,000 of imports we granted a tariff rebate of 20 per cent. In this way something like $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 was kept from going into the United States treasury.

Add to the adverse trade balance of nearly $50,000,000 the amount lost in treasury revenue and you have a pretty big total representing the cost of our philanthropical "reciprocity" with Cuba. Somebody is making big money out of the deal, but it is not the United States.

THE OLD COURSE IS THE SAFEST.

Our ship of state will find itself in troubled waters if her navigators are permitted to throw overboard the chart and compass that for ten years have guided the noble vessel through seas of unparalleled prosperity.

Tariff Sense and Nonsense.

Mr. Bryan does not have much faith in the prediction that the tariff is to be the paramount idea in the next campaign. He says that, in his opinion, it will occupy no such place of importance. It will be merely incidental. Here is a matter upon which the Nebraskan is eminently right. There is nothing in the tariff to quarrel over. This country continues to believe in a protective tariff, which is the true basis of our industrial and commercial supremacy. This country is not going to abandon that policy next year. To abandon it or to modify it greatly even would bring upon this country industrial horrors compared with which those of a dozen years ago would be mild, indeed. As we are industrially greater now than we were then so our depression would be greater. Cedar Rapids Republican.

"Sumptuary laws," says a Nashville Democratic paper, "are becoming cardinal doctrines of the party that formerly insisted that the best government was the one that governed least." The Democratic party appears to be in a condition to flop promiscuously without seriously injuring its prospects.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. [illegible] in 25c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes. [illegible] Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

WEATHER FORECAST.

Frost and Sunshine For November Says Prophet Smith.

P. R. Smith, the Kingwood weather prophet, has given out the following weather forecast for November:

"November generally through the entire month in all sections will be attended by light rains and also minimum winstorms. The month is comparatively free from storm exciting causes at all the storm periods. A more than November share of sunshine may be anticipated. The lakes on the northern boundary and the north Atlantic are prolific sources of storm centers within November. Indeed the squalls may be much modified there.

October will turn over an unfinished wave of disturbance attended by some active storms and clouds charged with electricity. The lakes most likely will be touched at this period by severe gales from the northwest. Frost and sunshine will follow on the heels of the disturbance, which will materalize about the 3rd and 4th.

About the 6th and 7th stormy and erratic weather will ensue, which may have touches of boreal on its wings, rain turning to sleet and snow, accompanied by high gales in some parts.

A storm wave will be central on or about the 12th, which may run from the 11th to the 15th. On its transit the changes of temperature follow the declination of the moon. On its northern declination it gets warmer, the air currents are drawn from the south.

On the 18th the temperature will change to warmer, then cloudiness, rain and snow flurries, followed by severe frosts on the 20th and 21st.

A storm wave will be on transit from the 22nd to the 26th. As the wave approaches the temperatures will change to warmer, followed by cloudiness; then rain, sleet and snow, followed by light freezing.

On the 28th, 29 and 30th a storm wave will be on transit. The weather will become much colder as we reach December.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Principal Points Executive Will Emphasize.

Persons who have talked to the President recently are convinced that his annual message will contain a most earnest recommendation of legislation providing that all corporations doing an inter-State business, and of a given magnitude, shall be required to procure a Federal license, to be issued only under restrictions as to capitalization, methods of doing business, the control of given industries and such other limitations as may be deemed necessary to the public safety and welfare.

With regard to railroads, an extension of the powers of the Inter-State Commerce Commission to include supervision of all stock and bond issues will be asked, together with authority to sanction railway pooling arrangements, not as to the division of profits, but as to the maintenance of uniform rates for like services.

An urgent recommendation will further be made that the Sherman antitrust law be so amended as to prohibit only such combinations in restraint of trade as may be pronounced by the courts to be unreasonable.

An urgent recommendation of financial legislation will be presented. Provision will be asked for emergency currency based on assets and so taxed as to insare its retirement as soon as the emergency has passed.

Other recommendations will include a graduated inheritance tax, consideration of a Federal income tax, the revision of the tariff on imports from the Philippines, the passage of a modified shipping bill, the creation of postal savings banks, the establishment of a more effective public health service than now exists, the extension of the parcels post, etc.

The President's friends gain the impression that he regards two measures as certain of enactment, the first providing elasticity fo the currency, the second amending the Sherman law as heretofore indicated. Beyond this, it is asserted, he is unwilling to go in making a forecast of the work of the coming session, although he sincerely hopes that the Philippine tariff bill, left over from a year ago, will receive prompt and favorable action, and that a modified form of the shipping bill, which passed both houses during the last session, will also be written on the statutes.

AN AUTOMOBILE FOR ICE.

Machine To Be Used in Antarctic Exploration.

Three or four months ago an expedition sailed from England for the purpose of further exploring the Antarctic continent. Its leader, Mr. Shackleton, was formerly associated with Captain Scott, who was in charge of a previous undertaking of the same kind. Like his former chief, Mr. Shackleton has planned to follow an exceptionally favorable route. He will take his ship to a remarkably deep indentation in the coast of Antarctica, which is to be found nearly south of New Zealand. His change from marine to land transportation will thus be made at a point much nearer the South Pole than any other known to be accessible. To the right hand of the bay just mentioned, sometimes called Rose Sea, is a vast region named after Queen Victoria. To the left is another, which Captain Scott designated King Edward Land. The latter has not been examined with much care and will now be freshly studied, but Mr. Shackleton's great ambition is to see if he cannot go further south than his predecessor.

When Captain Scott temporarily abandoned his vessel he traveled in sledges, which were hauled by dogs. Mr. Shackleton has taken dogs and Siberian ponies with him, but he is also going to try a new mode of transportation. An automobile has been manufactured for this special purpose in Scotland. As will be perceived the rear wheels are provided with immense cogs, which should give a fine grip on the ice, and the forward wheels can be attached to long runners.

Inasmuch as the temperature in the Antarctic regions remains below the freezing point most of the time (if not always), the precipitation there is in the form of snow, which scarcely has a chance to melt. Instead it is gradually converted into ice, and a layer of that material of unknown thickness covers the whole continent. This is not so smooth as it might be, but the surface is more level and unbroken than it is over the Arctic Sea. Whether the new vehicle to be employed will turn out to be better than the old ones remains to be seen. However, if with his dogs Mr. Shackleton should carry an extra supply of gasoline to some wisely selected spot a long distance from his ship and deposit it there before starting in his automobile, he would seem to have a good chance of beating Captain Scott's performance. Everything apparently depends on the amount of this fuel he can have at his command.

In the Southern Hemisphere summer prevails when it is winter in the Northern. If Mr. Shackleton has not yet reached the entrance to Rose Sea he will probably arrive there soon. The floating ice in that region is a pretty formidable obstacle to navigation, and the best time for forcing a ship through it will be afforded within the next two or three months. Perpetual daylight should reign within the Antarctic Circle until late in March. Hence the first use of the automobile will probably be made early in the coming year.

WEATHER FORECAST.

Frost and Sunshine For November Says Prophet Smith.

P. R. Smith, the Kingwood weather prophet, has given out the following weather forecast for November:

"November generally through the entire month in all sections will be attended by light rains and also minimum winstorms. The month is comparatively free from storm exciting causes at all the storm periods. A more than November share of sunshine may be anticipated. The lakes on the northern boundary and the north Atlantic are prolific sources of storm centers within November. Indeed the squalls may be much modified there.

October will turn over an unfinished wave of disturbance attended by some active storms and clouds charged with electricity. The lakes most likely will be touched at this period by severe gales from the northwest. Frost and sunshine will follow on the heels of the disturbance, which will materalize about the 3rd and 4th.

About the 6th and 7th stormy and erratic weather will ensue, which may have touches of boreal on its wings, rain turning to sleet and snow, accompanied by high gales in some parts.

A storm wave will be central on or about the 12th, which may run from the 11th to the 15th. On its transit the changes of temperature follow the declination of the moon. On its northern declination it gets warmer, the air currents are drawn from the south.

On the 18th the temperature will change to warmer, then cloudiness, rain and snow flurries, followed by severe frosts on the 20th and 21st.

A storm wave will be on transit from the 22nd to the 26th. As the wave approaches the temperatures will change to warmer, followed by cloudiness; then rain, sleet and snow, followed by light freezing.

On the 28th, 29 and 30th a storm wave will be on transit. The weather will become much colder as we reach December.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Principal Points Executive Will Emphasize.

Persons who have talked to the President recently are convinced that his annual message will contain a most earnest recommendation of legislation providing that all corporations doing an inter-State business, and of a given magnitude, shall be required to procure a Federal license, to be issued only under restrictions as to capitalization, methods of doing business, the control of given industries and such other limitations as may be deemed necessary to the public safety and welfare.

With regard to railroads, an extension of the powers of the Inter-State Commerce Commission to include supervision of all stock and bond issues will be asked, together with authority to sanction railway pooling arrangements, not as to the division of profits, but as to the maintenance of uniform rates for like services.

An urgent recommendation will further be made that the Sherman antitrust law be so amended as to prohibit only such combinations in restraint of trade as may be pronounced by the courts to be unreasonable.

An urgent recommendation of financial legislation will be presented. Provision will be asked for emergency currency based on assets and so taxed as to insare its retirement as soon as the emergency has passed.

Other recommendations will include a graduated inheritance tax, consideration of a Federal income tax, the revision of the tariff on imports from the Philippines, the passage of a modified shipping bill, the creation of postal savings banks, the establishment of a more effective public health service than now exists, the extension of the parcels post, etc.

The President's friends gain the impression that he regards two measures as certain of enactment, the first providing elasticity fo the currency, the second amending the Sherman law as heretofore indicated. Beyond this, it is asserted, he is unwilling to go in making a forecast of the work of the coming session, although he sincerely hopes that the Philippine tariff bill, left over from a year ago, will receive prompt and favorable action, and that a modified form of the shipping bill, which passed both houses during the last session, will also be written on the statutes.

AN AUTOMOBILE FOR ICE.

Machine To Be Used in Antarctic Exploration.

Three or four months ago an expedition sailed from England for the purpose of further exploring the Antarctic continent. Its leader, Mr. Shackleton, was formerly associated with Captain Scott, who was in charge of a previous undertaking of the same kind. Like his former chief, Mr. Shackleton has planned to follow an exceptionally favorable route. He will take his ship to a remarkably deep indentation in the coast of Antarctica, which is to be found nearly south of New Zealand. His change from marine to land transportation will thus be made at a point much nearer the South Pole than any other known to be accessible. To the right hand of the bay just mentioned, sometimes called Rose Sea, is a vast region named after Queen Victoria. To the left is another, which Captain Scott designated King Edward Land. The latter has not been examined with much care and will now be freshly studied, but Mr. Shackleton's great ambition is to see if he cannot go further south than his predecessor.

When Captain Scott temporarily abandoned his vessel he traveled in sledges, which were hauled by dogs. Mr. Shackleton has taken dogs and Siberian ponies with him, but he is also going to try a new mode of transportation. An automobile has been manufactured for this special purpose in Scotland. As will be perceived the rear wheels are provided with immense cogs, which should give a fine grip on the ice, and the forward wheels can be attached to long runners.

Inasmuch as the temperature in the Antarctic regions remains below the freezing point most of the time (if not always), the precipitation there is in the form of snow, which scarcely has a chance to melt. Instead it is gradually converted into ice, and a layer of that material of unknown thickness covers the whole continent. This is not so smooth as it might be, but the surface is more level and unbroken than it is over the Arctic Sea. Whether the new vehicle to be employed will turn out to be better than the old ones remains to be seen. However, if with his dogs Mr. Shackleton should carry an extra supply of gasoline to some wisely selected spot a long distance from his ship and deposit it there before starting in his automobile, he would seem to have a good chance of beating Captain Scott's performance. Everything apparently depends on the amount of this fuel he can have at his command.

In the Southern Hemisphere summer prevails when it is winter in the Northern. If Mr. Shackleton has not yet reached the entrance to Rose Sea he will probably arrive there soon. The floating ice in that region is a pretty formidable obstacle to navigation, and the best time for forcing a ship through it will be afforded within the next two or three months. Perpetual daylight should reign within the Antarctic Circle until late in March. Hence the first use of the automobile will probably be made early in the coming year.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, NOV. 21, 1907.

FOR A SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

In THE REPUBLICAN of last week there was published a communication from Mr. A. F. George, of Swanton, in which our correspondent advanced his ideas and made some valuable suggestions concerning the erection of a suitable memorial to the soldiers and sailors who enlisted in the Civil and Spanish-American Wars from Garrett county. By an oversight on the part of either the proofreader or the typesetter an error, humiliating to both Mr. George and to the editor, crept into the communication in question, but which, we believe, no fair-minded person will take exceptions to after reading the correction published in another column of this paper over the signature of Mr. George. With Mr. George we believe that the monument should be erected, not by the Republicans, Democrats or Prohibitionists, but by the people as a whole.

This matter, as early as last June or July, was taken up and discussed at some length by Col. A. G. Sturgiss, commander of the Grand Army Post in Oakland, and the editor of THE REPUBLIKAN, when the latter at the solicitation of Col. Sturgiss, went before the Board of County Commissioners and asked that body for the donation on the court house lot of a site for the monument should the movement to erect such a memorial take definite shape. The Board very considerately acceded to the request and, we believe, entered an order on the records in their office setting aside the site.

While this paper has not lost interest in the matter, other matters have been claiming the time and attention of the editor, so that it was allowed to lie in abeyance until a more propitious time. This time, we believe, has now arrived and THE REPUBLICAN will lend its best endeavors toward the erection of this deserved memorial to the defenders of our loved nation.

We suggest that an association, composed of representative citizens from every part of the county be formed and that this association have the matter entirely in charge; that our representatives in the General Assembly endeavor to have passed a bill appropriating from the State Treasury a sum of money for the object and that every resident of the county contribute little or much toward the fund to be raised for the purpose.

Over in the adjoining county of Preston a magnificent monument, erected on the court house lawn at Kingwood, was recently unveiled. The shaft stands at at a height of about twenty feet, which is surmounted by an infrantryman clothed in all the accoutrements of war. This memorial was erected and paid for by the residents of the county, its cost being in the neighborhood of $9000.

We would be pleased to hear from others on this subject and trust that the suggestion made by Mr. George will bear fruit.

FOREST FAMINE.

"In twenty years," says the Department of Agriculture, "the timber supply in the United States, on government reserves and private holdings, at the present rate of cutting will be exhausted, although it is possible that the growth of that period might defer the arrival of the famine another five years." With a view of providing against such a contingency, President Roosevelt has issued a call for a conference of the governors of the states and territories and of the members of both houses of Congress to consider the problem of conserving our natural resources. This is a wise thought. The pioneers of our country felled the forests to convert them into farms and rightly felt that in clearing the waste places they were doing the work of civilization. They took what lay at hand and used it without a thought of economy, for a whole virgin continent spread before them. The uppermost thought of many generations of Americans was to subdue the soil, and in subduing it they committed ravages, the affect of which on the future of the continent and the nation they never measured. In addition to these comments the New York Tribune says: "Americans have shown great waste in the using of coal and are using ores, if not with improvidence, at least with a lavishness never before dreamed of. Coal and ore we cannot replace, and when they are exhausted science will have to look about for convenient substitutes. But the grossest abuse of trust has occurred in the squandering of timber resources, for trees can be grown to replace those cut and used, but instead of employing forethought and scientific care to replenish our forests we have allowed them to be devastated by the timber hunter, intent only on quick profits through wholesale denudation. As a tributary evil the sources of our water supply have been dried up, spring floods have become chronic and the possibility of converting vast areas of arid lands into fertile acres by means of irrigation has been greatly retarded. It is time to call a halt on the old spirit of improvidence and destruction. The administration, by insisting on the enlargement of the national forest reserve, their cultivation according to enlightened modern methods, the preservation of the coal and mineral bearing portions of the public domain and the non-alienation to private exploiters of the natural resources still left to the nation, has set on foot a reform of far reaching importance. No task is more deserving or has in it more promise for the good of future generations than this one of assuring them against the depletion of the stock of resources on which they must depend so largely for comfort and progress."

The convention next May can do a great work in strengthening and enlarging President Roosevelt's patriotic and enlightened program and it is believed will do much toward preventing the threatened famine of our forests.

SOME RECOMMENDATIONS.

Having completed a large portion of his forthcomiug message to congress President Roosevelt takes the public into his confidence and tells what he is going to recommend in the way of new legislation by the national lawmakers. He will favor: (1) a postal savings bank; (2) extension of the parcel post; (3) lakes-to-the-gulf deep waterway; (4) extension or the powers of the interstate commerce commission to include supervision of stock and bond issues; (5) amendment of the Sherman anti-trust law so as to prohibit only such combinations as are pronounced by the court to be unreasonable; (6) plan for emergency currency; (7) graduated inheritance tax; (8) federal income tax and a number of other measures of more or less importance. While it is not unusual for a President to indicate his policies or give an inkling of his recommendations to congress in advance of the recommendations being actually made, it is something of a departure for a Chief Executive to go so completely into the details of his desires in a legislative way as Mr. Roosevelt has done. And, altogether, the departure is quite an agreeable one. It gives the people an opportunity to study them and to discuss them with their representatives in the national law-making body in their own bailwicks before action is taken.

WHY THE NEW STATE OF OKLAHOMA IS DEMOCRATIC.

In recent years a sort of feeling has spread abroad that Republicanism stands for progressivness, energy, push, activity, in short all those qualities necessary to success along all lines. On the other hand the prevalence of Democracy in too great quantities is considered a sort of blight on the prospects of any community. The progress of the North and the lack of progressiveness in some parts of the Democracy ridden South have served as illustrations along this line. With these mental pictures fairly well outlited on the average brain it was hard to conceive how a new State with every reason to want nothing but the best things should place itself in the hands of Democrats and allow the members of a discredited party to write its constitution and preside over its destinies. A great many people have wondered how such a thing can be accounted for, it is quite easy if looked at in the true light. It is a well recognized fact that in the main people follow the parallels of latitude when seeking new homes in the West. This has been pointed out by eminent authorities and cannot be disputed. Thus New England people settled the States of the Northwest, the people of Middle States, the territory of the middle West, and so on. With this idea in mind a look at a map will show that Oklahoma is directly west of Arkansas, catches a large part of Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia, and all of Tennessee, North and South Carolina. It also lies directly west of Southern Missouri, to say nothing of the fact that it sits in the lap of Texas. In short it is southern territory and was largely peopled from rock-ribbed southern States. In view of these conditions it doesn't seem much wonder that Oklahoma is Democratic, although the majority is not very large and the Republicans of the State are very hopeful that before many years the State will enter the Republican fold along with the progressive States of the North and West.

BASE INGRATITUDE.

After a newspaper man has yelled himself hoarse in an effort to persuade people to patronize home merchants and accidentally stumbles on to the fact that the same fellows he is trying to protect are sending away for their job printing or are using printed matter sent out by patent medicine houses, soap factories or other concerns, it rather shakes his confidence in mankind and make reciprocity look like a lead dime with a hole in it.—Journal.

While we agree with the Journal in the above, yet that paper is entirely inconsistent in its argument when the fact is taken into consideration that it is equally guilty with the merchant who sends away for his job printing, for is it not a fact that the Journal recently had the ballots printed in Frederick for use at the county election when the work could have been done right here at home, even though the Journal was not equipped for it?

BRAINARD H. WARNER.

In view of the announcement of Mr. B. H. Warner, of Kensington, that he will be a candidate to succeed Col. Geo. A. Pearre as Representative in Congress from the Sixth District the following sketch of his life will be of interest to our readers:

"Mr. Brainard H. Warner was born in Susquehanna county, Pennsylvania, and came to Washington in 1863 and, for the three months after his arrival, was a clerk in the Judiciary Square Hospital, when he was promoted to a clerkship in the War Department, where he remained until the latter part of 1866, when he was appointed to a position in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury. At the same time, he was Private Secretary for Hon. Charles R. Buckalew, who was then a prominent Democratic Senator from Pennsylvania.

"In the latter part of 1867, he was made Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue of the 9th District of Pennsylvania, with headquarters at Lancaster, where he also continued his law studies with Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, then a Republican member of Congress from that District. He started a paper while in this position called "The Voice of Truth" and also aided in publishing "The Father Abraham," a picturesque campaign journal, using the Dutch dialect.

"In 1868, he resigned, for the purpose of completing his course at the Columbia College Law School, in Washington, and after making a long tour through the West, as a correspondent for "The Harrisburg Telegraph," entered the school and graduated a year later. He was reappointed to his old position in the Treasury Department, but in a few months, upon his graduation, he entered upon the practice of law.

"Better opportunities seemed to offer in the real estate business, for which he relinquished law and for many years has been prominent in every movement looking to the development of the National Capital. He was a member of the committee of one hundred, to whose labors is largely attributable the present form of government of the District of Columbia. He has also been connected with some of the leading banks, institutions, and companies in the District of Columbia and Maryland, among them we give the following: A charter member of the Metropolis Savings Bank, Central National Bank, and Second National Bank, a Director of the National Metropolitan Bank, and National Safe Deposit and Trust Company and the founder of the B. H. Warner Company, The Rudolph West Company, the Columbia National Bank and the Washington Loan and Trust Company. He was President of the two latter named institutions until pressure of business lead to his retirement, and, ever since, he has been a member of their Boards of Directors and Executive Committees. One of the founders of the Washington Public Library and Vice-President from its incorporation; member of the Board of Trustees of the American University and Trustee of Howard University, and President Alumni Association, George Washington University; one of founders of the Washington Board of Trade and its second President, member of the Chamber of Commerce, President of the Young Men's Christian Association and a member of the various Inaugural Executive Committees since 1870.

"During the last three inaugurations he was Grand Marshal of the division of civic organizations. Mr. Warner was President of the local branch of the Red Cross during the Spanish-American War, President of the National Philharmonic Society and Secretary of the Yellow Fever Aid Society, President of the Sound Money Club during the campaign of 1896, dedicating his entire office force for several months to the work of that campaign. He was Treasurer of the Inaugural Committee when General Harrison became President, President of the Kensington Electric Railway and one of the builders of the Baltimore Line and Eckington Railways. He has also served upon hundreds of committees and delegations.

"He was for many years President of the Central Dispensary and Emergency Hospital and under his administration the building it now occupies was erected; was also President of the Industrial Home School. He served as a member ef the Board of Directors of the American Security Company of New York. Trustee of the U. S. Reform School. He has been chairmau of the Board of Trustees of National Park Seminary, Forest Glen, Md., since its foundation. He was the first Worshipful Master of Kensington Lodge, F. and A. M.; a member of Lafayette Chapter, De Holay Commandery and Almas Temple.

"For more than twenty years, he has been interested in Maryland politics and a prominent member of the Republican party, whose interests he has advanced by active participation in campaigns in different sections of the State. He was proprietor of the Montgomery Press for several years, and also President of the Maryland Republican Editorial Association. He was also one of the original proprietors and developers of Takoma Park, Woodside, Forest Glen, Hyattsville and several other suburbs and secretary of the committee of five on the Rock Creek Park.

"In 1891, he founded the town of Kensington, Montgomery County, which largely through his instrumentality, has grown to be an attractive and important suburb of the National Capital. Here, he built an attractive home, where he has since resided; and here, he built the Warner Memorial Presbyterian Church, in memory of his father, and also the Noyes Library, which he presented to the town. He is a member of the Bar of Montgomery County, of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, and of the several Courts of the District of Columbia. The degree of L. L. D. was conferred upon Mr. Warner by Erskine College, South Carolina. Mr. Warner is a member of the Burnside Post, Grand Army of the Republic; a member of the Republican Club of New York and an honorary member of the American Club of Pittsburg; was one of the Vice-Presidents of the League of Republican Clubs.

"He was a warm, personal friend of the late President McKinley and is an ardent admirer of President Roosevelt and his policies.

"In politics he is a thorough Republican, though not an intense partisan. He has been frequently mentioned for Congress in the Sixth District of Maryland, but thus far has preferred business to politics. Now, that he has retired from active participation in business, he has, at the suggestion of many friends, announced himself as a candidate for Congressional honors."

The foregoing sketch has been prepared by his Campaign Committee to better acquaint the voters of the Sixth District of Maryland with the unusually active career of Mr. Warner and the large experience he has had in many lines of business and professional life. While he has been successful in business, he has, for many years, given a large part of his time to the service of the public.

Youghiogheny Light and Power Co.

The directors of the above named company meet in their office, in Oakland, Md., on the 15th inst., and voted to increase its capital stock to $200,000. Ever since this company was organized we have been constantly receiving inquiries from prospective subscribers to its capital stock, asking for further facts, figures and details, to enable them to make their own calculations before investing their money in this enterprise. In reply to these inquiries and for the information of the public generally, we now frankly disclose all the facts and an approximate estimate of the total cost and annual income of this phenominal enterprise, which is based upon the calculation and opinions of numerous experts in all sections of the country.

Estimate cost of plant and equipment complete $200,000. Proposed plan to secure the necessary funds, viz. Sale of 1,000 First Mortgage bonds, $100 each, $100,000; 10,000 shares of Capital stock, $10 each, $100,000; less 5 per cent reserved to 1 year's interest on bonds, $5,000; net capital, $195,000.

Estimate annual income: Rental of 10,000 horse power at $20 per horse, $200,000; less contingent expenses of running plant first year, $10,000. balance, $190,000; refunding the First Mortgage bonds, in full, $100,000; balance to be distributed among share holders, first year, $90,000.

After the first year the entire net receipt of $190,000 annually to be distributed among the holders of the shares of capital stock.

The rental of power, in various sections of the country, range from $20 np to $40 annually for each horse power. In order to be conservative we use the lowest rate in the above calculations. According to the above statement each horse power will cost less than $2 per year, and if rented at the lowest rate, $20 per year, the share holders will, after the first year realize the marvelous profit of one thousand per cent. This is no wild cat scheme, or oil well venture, the water power is plain to be seen by everybody, and surpasses anything in the kind in the State if not in the United States. The plant will be located in the heart of an immense undeveloped coal region extending to Kingwood, Fairmont, Morgantown, etc. in West Virginia; Pittsburg, Connellsville, Uniontown, etc., in Pennsylvania; Oakland, Grantsville, Frostburg, Cumberland, etc., in Maryland, to any and all of which towns the surplus light and power, that is not leased by local trolley railroads, manufacturing plants, etc., can be transmitted by wires.

In California both light and power are now being successfully transmitted 290 miles from the plant, and none of the above named cities and towns are half that far from this plant.

There will be no limit to the local demand for power to run trains on trolley roads in all directions to the numerous undeveloped mines nearby. One of the most important shortlines will be seven miles from Oakland to Swallow Falls where it will connect with the Kendall Lumber Company's steam railroad to Confluence on the Pittsburg division of the B. & O. Space will not now permit a description of the numerous trolley roads and manufacturing plants contemplated.

The charter of this company secures a monopoly of one of the most wonderful freaks of nature east of the Rocky Mountains. During past ages the river has cut a gorge over 300 feet deep between the mouths of Deep Creek and Muddy Creek, giving both of those streams a fall of about 300 perpendicular feet and the river itself a fall of about 200 feet to the plant, which will be located about half a mile below Deep Creek Falls. A peculiar natural advantage of this water power is that no dams at all are required. Pipes will receive the water above each fall and convey it to "impulse" water wheels at the bottom of each pipe line in the plant.

The marvelous profit of one thousand per cent per annum, should cause merchants and other business men to sell out at once, and invest their money in this wonderful enterprise before it is snatched up by non resident capitalists. Land owners in the vicinity have offered free right of way to lay pipes, erect necessary poles, etc.

Respectfully,
HIRAM P. TASKER,
General Manager.

STARTING POINT OF THE POTOMAC

Is Not at the Fairfax Stone as is Generally Believed.

Nearly all maps and not a few historians gives the famous Fairfax Stone, situated about a half mile in a southwesterly direction from the station at Fairfax, W. Va., as the starting point of the mighty Potomac River and also as marking the beginning of the Maryland State line. While as a matter of fact the Potomac River does have its origin near the Fairfax Stone, yet the streams flow in two branches from a spring in the mountain side, about two hundred feet from the top of the Alleganies, and both streams flow around the historic spot, joining about 35 feet further down the mountain side stream not large enough to crowd one inch pipe. And so far as the Maryland State line is concerned it is not closer than with in one-half mile of the Fairfax Stone, which mark stands entirely on West Virginia territory. The spring from which the Potomac River has its source and flows onward to the sea is at an altitude of 3,560 feet. From the point at which the two streams join they flow northwest, gradually circling towards the north and east. From a little distance above the spring the Maryland-West Virginia State line may be seen for miles, as there is a strip cleared about one rod wide, which was done a few years ago, when the line was re-run. After the Potomac crosses this line about one-half mile from the stone, it is a few hundred yards from there met by another rivulet from the Maryland side, which is flowing nearly due south. They then flow around a hill in an easterly direction until they reach a point about one and a half miles below Fairfax Station. There this rivulet is met by a stream from the Maryland side, and quite near this place one from West Virginia side. Here it forms quite a brook, and meanders for miles in a northeasterly direction.

The Fairfax Stone was built of two rocks placed side by side which form a foundation about two feet square, roughly dressed with a hammer and placed so as to extend about eight inches above the surface of the ground. Upon this stands a cut stone two feet square and eighteen inches deep, and capped off on top to a square of thirteen inches. There has been another stone or shaft placed upon this which has been destroyed. All four sides of this stone has cut on it the letters "F. S." and one face is covered with an inscription which time has obliterated. These rocks were brought from the top of the hill some distance back as there are no rocks of this kind any size near the spring. Maryland has nothing whatever to do with the Fairfax Stone, except that it is the starting point from which to run the western line to a point at the beginning of the Maryland State line.

Some historians state that [illegible] Washington explored this country, located the stone and ran the line from here due north to the Pennsylvania line. But as this can hardly be true, for the records show that this stone was placed here and the line was run in 1745, which the date on the stone would indicate, by the corps of surveyors in the employ of Lords Baltimore and Fairfax. At that date Washington was only a lad in his teens.

Most merchants realize the value of attractive, original window displays in connection with their seasonable trade. The store window is at all times one of the most valuable store adjuncts and trade-getters that the merchant can make use of. All attractive window displays always draw the attention of the shopper, and if, besides being attractive, it contains any suggestions, it is bound to sell the goods. If the merchant or any of his clerks, who may have more talent along this line, will devote a little earnest thought and time to getting up a series of attractive, suggestive and original displays, he will find that it will tend to materially swell his receipts.

In Memoriam.

Althea Pearl Yommer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Yommer, of Jennings, Md., departed this life on Sunday morning, October 20th, aged 1 year, 9 months and 1 day. "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." The Master took the little darling by the hand and guided her safely home to join her lisping voice with that sweet chorus of angels who sing about the Father's throne, and to her pure and innocent memory these lines are dedicated:

When angel hands gathered sweet flowers for Heaven,
They plucked from earth's garden, a dear little child;
And bore her in peace to God, who had given,
The sweet precious darling so fair and so mild.

Vast floods of sorrow, from eyes that are weeping,
Cease not to flow from life's fountain of love;
While sunbeams of mercy through dark clouds are peeping.
'Tis well, for dear Althea is safely sheltered above.

Florists says that some flowers when made into bouquets together will wilt in a very short time. Roses and mignonette, for example, are so destructive to each other that they will not last through a dinner. It is possible that the sweet scent of flowers was once a deadly odor which killed other plants likely to grow in the same soil, and thus protect the plant giving it out.

As king over the stalwart oak and lofty pine, the fig tree would have been a dead failure, and as much out of place as some of our politicians are in congress; but for bearing figs the oak and the pine are its inferiors. Bearing figs is the grandest thing in the world for a fig tree. It shines in its own sphere; but stripped of its fig-bearing power, it has no excuse for existence. Sometimes a mother, who reigns a majestic queen in her own household, forsakes her quiet sweetness of home rule for a noisy, rough, public career, for which she has not the slightest qualification Of course there are no such mothers who are readers of this paper, but we have seen them, and so have you.

A preacher came at a newspaper man in this way: "You editors do not tell the truth. If you did you could not live; your newspapers would be a failure." The editor replied: "You are right and the minister who will at all times and under all circumstances tell the whole truth about his members, alive or dead, will not occupy his pulpit more than one Sunday, and then he will find it necessary to leave town in a hurry. The press and the pulpit go hand in hand with whitewash brushes and pleasant words, magnifying little virtues into big ones. The pulpit, the pen, and the grave stone are the great saint-making triumvirate." The great minister went away looking very thoughtful while the editor turned to his work, and told of the unsurpassing beauty of the bride, while in fact she was as homely as a mud fence.

ACCIDENT.

Rain and cool weather are upon us.

The election passed off pleasantly here.

Many are the questions being discussed here since Nov. 5th, some of which are tariff, dog tax, party bossism, prohibition, and the negro as a government factor. No doubt all of these will receive due attention and ventilation in the future of Garrett county.

Rev. Zimmerman, of the German Lutheran church, delivered an excellent sermon in English last Sunday.

The Accident school continues to grow in interest and in numbers. In addition to the pastor, the Rev. Mr. Stoneking and others are expected to deliver addresses.

CIVIL OLD AGE PENSIONS.

The superannuation committee o the National Civil Service Reform League deals the Keep old age pension plan some heavy blows in a report just presented at the league's annual meeting in Buffalo.

The evils of superannuation in the federal Civil Service are not extremely flagrant. There is undoubtedly an appreciable loss of efficiency on the part of clerks and operatives who have passed the age of sixtp-five. But under the proposed annuity plan involuntary retirements are not to begin until seventy, and only 1.2 per cent of the present federal employes are over seventy. On that basis, counting the efficiency of those now on the rolls who are over seventy at 75 per cent—or even at 50 per cent—the loss to the government in overpay is very small. The league's superannuation report of last year estimated the loss from inefficiency of employes over sixty-five at only $1,200,000 a year, or a fraction of 1 per cent of the annual payroll.

It may be conceded that it is highly desirable to avoid this depreciation. But it is even more desirable to avoid spending two or three times $1,200,000 a year to eliminate the superannuated. The Keep committee, composed of men naturally interested in promoting the welfare of the federal employes as individuals as well as in increasing their efficiency as a body, did not stop at recommending a compulsory savings plan in accordance with which each office-holder should provide for his own retirement, the government contributing the expense of administering the joint retirement fund. There would be no great objection to the adoption of such a scheme, especially if the Treasury were not called upon to pay too high a rate of interest on its enforced loans from the employes. But such a project would have little to recommend it to the civil servants themselves, for it would bring them no greater return on the whole than if they individually invested their savings in annuities or securities. It lacks the feature of giving something for nothing and that attractive feature the Keep committee supplied by proposing that the government credit to each employe now on the rolls the sum which he would have paid in had yearly assessments been levied on his salary since the day he entered the service. That assumption of retroactive unpaid obligations would cost the Treasury between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000.

We can see no justification for this gratuity. Neither can the Civil Service Reform League. The federal civil servants never dreamed of such a windfall when they took the office. They have had, in the main, easier hours, longer vacations, better pay and more consideration than persons doing the same grade of work in private employment, and they have no special claim on the government's indulgence. If they have been thrifty they have already saved the portion of salary which would have gone into the proposed annuity fund. Why then credit them with a retroactive allowance, equal in amount, bearing 4 per cent compound interest? That would be an extravagant price to pay for sparing the sensibilities of department and bureau chiefs who say that they lack the sternness of heart to discharge enfeebled clerks who have passed the seventy-year limit.

The superannuation committee makes another point against the Keep scheme which is worth noting, It is proposed to ask the government to collect salary assessments and hold or use them, allowing 4 per cent compound interest and meeting the annuities as they mature. That would put the Treasury in the position of a borrower at a much higher rate than its pays in the open money market. If it invested the annuity fund in its own bonds it would make 2 per cent and pay over 4 per cent, and the taxpayers would hav to contribute to make good the annual deficit. Unless the Treasury were to go into business in the way savings banks and insurance companies do, earning a higher rate of interest than is paid on the funds it held, the cost of operation of a superannuated annuity scheme would be vastly out of proportion to any benefits it could yield to the taxpaying public.

BRYAN WILL RUN AGAIN.

To Accept Nomination If Rank And File Want Him.

The first positive declaration by Mr. Bryan on the subject of his attitude toward the Democratic Presidential nomination of 1908 appears in this week's Commoner, to be issued tomorrow. In a prominent editorial place, under the heading "Mr. Bryan's Position," Mr. Bryan makes the guarded announcement that he is a candidate, and while he makes it plain that he would not accept the nomination except on a platform to his liking, he is not to be considered as personally seeking the nomination, but is willing to take it if the rank and file of the party ask him and desire him to make the race. The statement says:

"Mr. Bryan has from time to time refused to discuss the availability either of himself or other candidates, believing that the party should have all the light possible before attempting a selection. Mr. Bryan will not ask for or seek a nomination, and he will not assume to decide the question of his availability. If he can serve the party by being its candidate, he will accept the commission and make the best fight he can. If, however, the choice falls upon another, he will not be disappointed or disgusted. His availability is a question to be decided not by him, not by a few leaders, not even by the leading newspapers that call themselves Democrats, but by the voters of the party, and to them he intrusts the decision of the question. He takes it for granted that the organization of the party will be in harmony with the platform and will be composed of men whose political records will invite confidence and give assurance that a victory, if won, will not be a barren victory.

"It has been asserted that Mr. Bryan was waiting to see who the Republican nominee would be. This is untrue. He has never felt that his position should be dependent upon the action taken by the Republican party. The course of the Democratic party should be the same no matter which element controls the Republican convention.

"If the Republicans nominate a stand-patter, the Democrats can take advantage of the educational work that has been done by Republican reformers; if the Republicans nominate a candidate who is believed to be favorable to reform, such a nomination will strengthen Democratic doctrines, because Republican reformers advocate the reforms that the Democrats have advocated before them, and the Democrats cannot afford to surrender their position because the Republicans give a partial indorsement to a few Democratic doctrines. If the Republicans nominate one who straddles the issues and attempts to take both sides, it is none the less necessary for the Democratic party to make an aggressive fight. The action of the Republican convention may have its influence in the determining of the relative availability of Demoratic candidates, but it ought not to have any influence in determining the question whether the one chosen by the Democrats should accept the nomination. If the rank and file of the Democratic party desire Mr. Bryan to make the race, he will make it, no matter who may be the Republican nominee."

MAKING A NEWSPAPER.

Moving Pictures Show Every Step in Production of "The Record."

There has been a general curiosity on the part of the public to know how a modern newspaper is made and to satisfy all, the whole story was recently told at Keith's Philadelphia Theatre, in a remarkable series of life-motion pictures called "The Making of a Modern Newspaper." "The Philadelphia Record" was selected as the model by S. Lubin, who made the series of very realistic pictures.

The series opens with a scene representing a newspaper office over a hundred years ago. This is to give artistic and historical contrast to the great mechanical advance in journalism since that time. It shows the outside of an old Philadelphia printing shop, and the next glimpse is of the inside of the same printery. A journeyman is laboriously pulling impressions with a Blaew, or Washington hand press, while his apprentice is busy among the type, both being dressed in the costume of the period. Next appears Ben Franklin himself. He walks to the window, looks critically at the sheet, and again returns to his office, in a short time putting on his hat and walking out.

The next picture leaps across a century and gives a fine panoramic view of the home of "The Philadelphia Record." In a flash is seen "The Record's" famous Electric Baseball Score Board, with the great crowd watching the progress of an exciting game between the Detroits and the Athletics.

The next picture shows the business offices of "The Philadelphia Record," with the office force and the ordinary routine of business going on. From that point the real tour of "The Philadelphia Record" establishment begins.

The managing editor is shown in consultation with various members of his staff, and all so true to life that the effect is as if they were transacting their business in real flesh and blood before the audience. Next comes the city editor, with his corps of reporters, each one attending to his or her own business, according to the exigencies of the moment. This scene is succeeded by the department of the advertising manager, which shows an array of solicitors receiving their various assignments.

Receiving want and other advertisements by telephone is an interesting sight that follows next. This is a feature of advertising that in recent times has grown to great proportions. Something akin, but broader in its scope, is the succeeding view of the telegraph room, where a skilled corps of operators is busy receiving news from every point of the compass. The messages are directly taken on typewriters, and so realistic is the picture that the spectators can almost fancy they hear the click and rattle of the instruments and the machines.

Next comes a prominent feature of the making of a modern newspaper—the "Drawing of the Daily Cartoon." The spectators see the artist actually at work and are at once impressed with the deftness of his pen and the modesty of his studio. The next step is into the Mechanical Department, the visitor is treated to a close range view of "Setting Up Advertisements" by hand, succeeded by a tour through the linotyping room, where "The Philadelphia Record's" big batteries of linotype machines are shown in active operation. These almost human pieces of mechanism were never exhibited to better advantage. The stereotyping room comes next, with every operation shown in detail, including a complete demonstration of MacConnell's new Eclipse automatic finishing and cooling machine, which in one simple operation does the work of the four machines hitherto deemed necessary for shaving, trimming, cooling and accurately finishing semi-cylindrical stereotype plates.

The next natural step is a visit to "The Philadelphia Record's" press room, and the exhibition is such a fine one that even the dullest admire the magnificent series of views so faithfully portrayed on the screen. The great presses are shown to the fullest advantage from every end and angle, and at every stage of the journey, from the placing of the blank rolls on the spindles to the finished newspapers that may be seen rushing out of the mouths of the presses by the tens of thousands per hour.

One of the busiest departments is the delivery, mailing and shipping room, where the papers are automatically conveyed from the press room by an endless elevator and several hustling groups of men are kept on the jump putting up bundles, wrapping parcels and getting ready for the mail bags individual copies for out of town subscribers. Next is shown "Making the Trains," where the wagon delivery service every morning makes good the boast that "The Philadelphia Record" is always on time.

The final picture shows "The Philadelphia Record" at the breakfast table," and makes a fitting climax to the wonderful series. A typical American family is seen at home. The father, seated beside his wife, is showing "The Rectord" just received.

CHIEF JUDGE BOYD.

Regret That His Term is Near Expiration.

The designation by Governor Warfield of Judge A. Hunter Boyd as chief judge of the Court of Appeals will give satisfaction to the people of the State and it was doubtless made by the Governor after ascertaining the views of the members of the court. This appointment must go to the Senate in January for confirmation, and in the meantime Judge Boyd will, as the court is now in session, at once assume the duties of the exalted office to which he has been called. It is somewhat unfortunate that Judge Boyd's term of office is so near its end. The 15 years for which he was elected in 1893 will expire next November, and then the Governor will have to make an appointment to hold until the general election in 1909, when he will have to go before the people. Judge Boyd's circuit is composed of the counties of Garrett, Allegany and Washington, which, politically, are heavily Republican. But in that circuit Judge Alvey was elected after it became Republican, and Judge Boyd himself was also elected there 14 years ago. Possibly the Republican party in those counties, when the time comes, may recognize Judge Boyd's eminent fitness for the office and may not contest his election. While the office of chief justice is one of exalted dignity, no especial authority belongs to it. He is required by law to administer the oath of office to the Governor, and he presides over the Court of Appeals, being ordinarily the spokesman of the court. He also distributes the work of the court, assigning to the other judges the cases which are to be considered. His salary is identical with that of the other judges on the appelate bench being $4.500 a year, the amount received by the Governor.

Chief Justice Boyd comes in a long line of illustrious predecessors. But few of them, however, were lawyers until the reorganization of the court after the formation of the State government. The Court of Appeals of Maryland is one of the most ancient of courts in this country or England. It dates back to the year 1637, and there are reports of cases going back to that year which have not been published except in the Proceedings of the Council. The cases contained in the Maryland Reports begin with the year 1658. In an address upon the Chief Justices of the Court of Appeals the late Judge McSherry pointed out the fact that the Maryland Reports antedate those of any other State, being 72 years older than those of Pennsylvania, 120 years older than those of North Carolina, 125 years older than those of New York and 146 years older than those of Massachusetts.—Baltimore Sun.

J. S. LAKIN SHOT THIEF WHO WAS CAPTURED

Second Time That Robbers Had Been Discovered in Offutt & Lakin Store.

WORKING WITH CASH REGISTER

Watchman Discovered Him and Lakin Armed With Shot Gun Got Him—Other Escaped and Has Not Been Cau

Terra Alta, 10 miles west of Oakland, was greatly excited Thursday night and Friday morning over an attempted robbery which took place there last Thursday night in which one robber was shot through the leg and captured. Hon. James Lakin, former resident of Oakland, and a prominent Republican of that section of the state, shot the robber, emptying a load from a shot gun into his leg and so seriously injuring the fellow that he gave up and later was taken to the county jail where he was locked up for a hearing.

This is the second time within the week that an attempt was made to rob the store of Offutt & Lakin. The first time was on Monday night when George Ott, the day operator for the Baltimore & Ohio, who lives across the street, saw the robbers, but before he could get word to the officials and owners of the store the fellows were frightened away before they were able to secure anything.

Thursday night they came again and had hardly gotten inside the store when they were discovered by a watchman who had been placed on guard. The watchman immediately notified Mr. Lakin and the two went to the store armed. Mr. Lakin got inside the store before the fellow on the inside was aware of the fact that he was about to be caught and had the fellow off his guard. The fellow made an attempt to get away, but Mr. Lakin poured the contents of the shot gun after him and he was struck in the legs so that he fell down and seeing there was no use to attempt to get away without losing his life he gave up.

The other robber, who had been standing on guard outside of the store, was frightened away when the mix-up came and he took to his heels and made good his escape. An effort was made by others who were aroused by the shooting of the fellow in the store, to locate the one who got away, but though they searched a good part of the night they were not able to locate him anywhere.

When Mr. Lakin and the watchman entered the store the fellow on the inside was working with the cash register and it was evident that it was the intention to break it open. The fellows were evidently after money as they had not made the least attempt to get any of the goods in the store in such shape that they could have been carried away.

There was great excitement in the village during the rest of the night and Friday morning a large number of people went to see the robber in the hope that they would be able to identify him, but as far as could be learned no one knew the fellow and he was evidently a stranger in that part of the country. He will he held for a couple of days before given a hearing to await the result of the injuries inflicted by the man whom he was attempting to rob. It may be that he will waive examination and be held to court.

An effort was made to get the prisoner to tell who he was but he refused to give any name. A description of the man who made his escape has been sent to all the nearby towns and a close watch is being made of all trains on the railroad in the hopes that it will be possible to capture him.

PANAMA CANAL LOCKS.

Greater Width Than Was First Proposed Now Favored.

Unless there should be a change of programme the Panama Canal will not be at sea level and consequently will have locks. The latest plan having official approval called for locks 1,000 feet long and 100 feet wide. Within the last few weeks the question has been discussed in Washington whether the width here contemplated is sufficient. The largest merchant steamer now afloat, the Mauretania, measures 88 feet across. Were she to enter one of these locks and to keep on the centre line there would be only six feet to spare on either side of her. The largest war vessels now being built for the United States, the Delaware and the North Dakota, are to have a breadth of 85.3 feet, and there is talk of building still larger battleships. Now it may be doubted whether the commerce which is conducted through the Panama Canal will employ such ships as the Mauretania, but it is beyond dispute that the government should keep in view the possibility of transferring a fleet from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and vice versa. It should also provide for the handling of its very biggest ships there with entire safety.

If a perfect calm prevailed at all times, it ought to be comparatively easy to keep a big ship in the centre of a canal lock, but a strong breeze, striking her on one side at a time when her speed had been reduced to almost nothing, might well render the task impossible. A collision with the side of the lock would damage both the ship and the lock. Indeed, such an accident could interrupt traffic for days or weeks besides costing a great deal of money. These possibilities so strongly impressed the naval member of the Panama Commission (Lieutenant Rousseau), that he presented the case to the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Metcalf, not long ago, and urged the latter official to recommend giving a greater width to the locks. Mr. Metcalf saw the force of the argument and has advised that they be not less than 110 feet wide.

PRESERVING EGGS AND POTATOES.

New Schemes For Supplying Soldiers and Sailors.

The business of supplying the army and navy with rations suited to special emergencies is an important one. It has not yet reached the stage of perfection. Now that a big fleet is to be dispatched from the Atlantic Coast to the Pacific for purposes of drill an exceptional demand for such supplies has been created. The officers who are charged with the task have been considering two or three novel schemes. One is to prepare eggs in a powdered form, for use when the ten thousand dozen fresh eggs which are to be taken are gone. There are fifteen thousand men to provide for. Experiments are also being made with dried vegetables. Perhaps the most important venture is with canned potatoes.

According to a Washington dispatch, one hundred thousand pounds have been ordered. This is a new method of preserving vegetables and has been tried by the army in Alaska and the Philippines with such success that the commissary general of the army has been urging some of the canners to put up potatoes and onions in this form. The difficulty has been in the expense of the experiment. It is appreciated that if it is accomplished campers and miners and others who have to use canned goods will have their stock of supplies greatly improved by the acquisition of potatoes in this shape. The order from the Navy Department will enable the manufacturers to ascertaid at just what cost the potato may be canned. It is expected that the product soon will be placed on the general market, where it is likely to meet a certain regular demand.

CHAPTER XXII.
Plucked from the Burning.

That Miss Spencer was deeply agitated was evident at a glance, while the nervous manner in which she glanced in the direction of those distant gunshots, led Brant to jump to the conclusion that they were in some way connected with her appearance.

"Oh, Lieutenant Brant," she cried, excitedly, "they are going to kill him down there, and he never did it at all. I know he didn't, and so does Mr. Wynkoop. Oh, please hurry! Nobody knew where you were, until I saw your horse tied here, and Mr. Wynkoop has been hunting for you everywhere. He is nearly frantic, poor man, and I cannot learn where either Mr. Moffat or Mr. McNeil is, and I just know those dreadful creatures will kill him before we can get help."

"Kill whom?" burst in Brant, springing down the bank fully awakened to the realization of some unknown emergency. "My dear Miss Spencer, tell me your story quickly if you wish me to act. Who is in danger, and from what?"

The girl burst into tears, but struggled bravely through with her message.

"It's those awful men, the roughs and rowdies down in Glencaid. They say he murdered Red Slavin, that big gambler who spoke to me this morning, but he didn't for I saw the man who did, and so did Mr. Wynkoop. He jumped out of the saloon window, his hand all bloody, and ran away. But they've got him and the town marshal up behind the Shasta dump, and swear they're going to hang him if they can only take him alive. Oh, just hear those awful guns!"

"Yes, but who is it?"

"Bob Hampton, and—and he never did it at all."

Before Brant could either move or speak, Naida swept past him, down the steep bank, and her voice rang out clear, insistent. "Bob Hampton attacked by a mob? Is that true, Phoebe? They are fighting at the Shasta dump, you say? Lieut. Brant, you must act—you must act now, for my sake!"

She sprang toward the horse, nerved by Brant's apparent slowness to respond, and loosened the rein from the scrub oak. "Then I will go to him, even if they kill me also, the cowards!"

But Brant had got his head now. Grasping her arm and the rein of the plunging horse, "You will go home," he commanded, with the tone of military authority. "Go home with Miss Spencer. All that can possibly be done to aid Hampton I shall do—will you go?"

She looked helplessly into his face. "You—you don't like him," she faltered; "I know you don't. But—but you will help him, won't you, for my sake?"

He crushed back an oath. "Like him or not like him, I will save him if be in the power of man. Now will you go?"

"Yes," she answered, and suddenly extended her arms. "Kiss me first."

With the magical pressure of her lips upon his, he swung into the saddle and spurred down the road. It was a principle of his military training never to temperize with a mob—he would strike hard, but he must have sufficient force behind him. He reined up before the seemingly deserted camp, his horse flung back upon its haunches, white foam flecking its quivering flanks.

"Sergeant!" The sharp snap of his voice brought that officer forward on the run. "Where are the men?"

"Playin' ball, most of 'em, sir, just beyond the ridge."

"Are the horses out in the herd?"

"Yes, sir."

"Sound the recall; arm and mount every man; bring them into Glencaid on the gallop. Do you know the old Shasta mine?"

"No, sir."

"Half-way up the hill back of the hotel. You'll find me somewhere in front of it. This is a matter of life or death, so jump lively now!"

He drove in his spurs, and was off like the wind. A number of men were in the street, all hurrying forward in the same direction, but he dashed past them. These were minors mostly, eager to have a hand in the man-hunt. Here and there a rider skurried along and joined in the chase. Just beyond the hotel, half-way up the hill, rifles were speaking irregularly, the white puffs of smoke blown quickly away by the stiff breeze. Near the center of this line of skirmishers a denser cloud was beginning to rise in spirals. Brant, perceiving the largest group of men gathered just before him, rode straight toward them. The crowd scattered slightly at his approach, but promptly closed in again as he drew up his horse with taut rein. He looked down into rough, bearded faces. Clearly enough these men were in no fit spirit for peace making.

"You damn fool!" roared one, hoarsely, his gun poised as if in threat, "what do you mean by riding us down like that? Do you own this country?"

...t flung himself from the saddle and strode in front of the fellow. "I mean business. You see this uniform? Strike that, my man, and you strike the United States. Who is leading this outfit?"

"I don't know as it's your affair," the man returned, sullenly. "We ain't takin' no army orders at present, mister. We're free-born American citizens, an' ye better let us alone."

"That is not what I asked you," and Brant squared his shoulders, his hands clinched. "My question was, Who is at the head of this outfit? and I want an answer."

The spokesman looked around upon the others near him with a grin of derision. "Oh, ye do, hey? Well, I reckon we are, if you must know. Since Big Jim Larson got it in the shoulder this outfit right yere hes bin doin' most of the brain work. So if ye've got anythin' ter say, mister officer man, I reckon ye better spit it out yere ter me, an' sorter relieve yer mind."

"Who are you?"

The fellow expectorated vigorously into the leaves under foot, and drawing one hairy hand across his lips, flushed angrily to the unexpected inquiry.

"Oh, tell him, Ben. What's the blame odds? He can't do ye no hurt."

The man's look became dogged. "I'm Ben Colton, if it'll do ye any good to know."

"I thought I had seen you somewhere before," said Brant, contemptuously, and then swept his glance about the circle. "A nice leader of vigilantes you are, a fine representative of law and order, a lovely specimen of the free-born American citizen! Men, do you happen to know what sort of a cur you are following in this affair?"

"Oh, Ben's all right."

"What ye got against him, young feller?"

"Just this," and Brant squarely fronted the man, his voice ringing like steel. "I've seen mobs before to-day, and I've dealt with them. I'm not afraid of you or your whole outfit, and I've got fighting men to back me up. I never yet saw any mob which wasn't led and incited by some cowardly, revengeful rascal. Honest men get mixed up in such affairs, but they are invariably inflamed by some low-down sneak with an ax to grind. I confess I don't know all about this Colton, but I know enough to say he is an army deserter, a liar, a dive-keeper, a gambler, and, to my certain knowledge, the direct cause of the death of three men, one a soldier of my troop. Now isn't he a sweet specimen to lead in the avenging of a supposed crime?"

Whatever else Colton might have failed in, he was a man of action. Like a flash his gun flew to the level, but was instantly knocked aside by the grizzled old miner standing next him.

"None o' that, Ben," he growled, warningly. "I don't never pay to shoot holes in Uncle Sam."

Brant smiled. He was not there just then to fight, but to secure delay until his own men could arrive, and to turn aside the fierce mob spirit if such a result was found possible.

"I really would enjoy accommodating you, Colton," he said, coolly, feeling much more at ease, "but I never fight personal battles with such fellows as you. And now, you other men, it is about time you woke up to the facts of this matter. A couple of hundred of you chasing after two men, one an officer of the law doing his sworn duty, and the other innocent of any crime. I should imagine you would feel proud of your job."

"Innocent? Hell!"

"That is what I said. You fellows have gone off half-cocked—a mob generally does. Both Miss Spencer and Mr. Wynkoop state positively that they saw the real murderer of Red Slavin, and it was not Bob Hampton."

The men were impressed by his evident earnestness, his unquestioned courage. Several voices spoke almost at once.

"Is that right?"

"Oh, say, I saw the fellow with his hand on the knife."

"After we git the chap, we'll give them people a chance to tell what they know."

Brant's keenly attentive ears heard the far-off chug of numerous horses' feet.

"I rather think you will," he said, confidently, his voice ringing out with sudden authority.

He stepped back, lifted a silver whistle to his lips, and sounded one sharp, clear note. There was a growing thunder of hoofs, a quick, manly cheer, a crashing through the underbrush, and a squad of eager troopers, half-dressed but with faces glowing in anticipation of trouble, came galloping up the slope, swinging out into line as they advanced, their carbines gleaming in the sunlight. It was prettily, sharply performed, and their officer's face brightened.

"Very nicely done, Watson," he said to the expectant sergeant. "Deploy your men to left and right, and clear out those shooters. Make a good job of it, but no firing unless you have to."

The troopers went at it as if they enjoyed the task, forcing their restive horses through the thickets, and roughly handling more than one who ventured to question their authority. Yet the work was over in less time than it takes to tell, the discomfited regulators driven pell-mell down the hill and back into the town, the eager cavalrymen halting only at the command of the bugle. Brant, confident of his first sergeant in such emergency, merely paused long enough to watch the men deploy, and then pressed straight up the hill, alone and on foot. That danger to the besieged was yet imminent was very evident. The black spiral of smoke had become an enveloping cloud, spreading rapidly in both directions from its original starting-point. He arrived finally where the ground was charred black and covered with wood ashes, still hot under foot and smoking, but he pressed upward, sheltering his eyes with uplifted arm, and seeking passage where the scarcity of underbrush rendered the zone of fire less impassable. He could see scarcely three yards in advance, but to the rear the narrow lane of retreat remained open. Standing there, as though in the mouth of a furnace, the red flames scorching his face, Brant hollowed his hands for a call.

"Hampton!" The word rang out over the infernal crackling and roaring like the note of a trumpet.

"Ay! What is it?" The returning voice was plainly not Hampton's yet it came from directly in front, and not far away.

"Who are you? Is that you, Marshal?"

"Thet's the ticket," answered the voice, gruffly, "an' just as full o' fight es ever."

Brant lifted his jacket to protect his face from the scorching heat. There was certainly no time to lose in any exchange of compliments.

"I'm Brant, lieutenant Seventh cavalry," he cried, choking with the thickening smoke. "My troop has scattered those fellows who were hunting you. I'll protect you and your prisoner, but you'll have to get out of there at once. Can you locate me and make a dash for it? Wrap your coats around your heads, and leave your guns behind."

An instant he waited for the answer, fairly writhing in the intense heat, then Mason shouted, "Hampton's been shot, and I'm winged a little; I can't carry him."

Brant ripped off his jacket, wrapped it about his face, jammed a handkerchief into his mouth and with a prayer in his heart, leaped forward into the seemingly narrow fringe of fire in his front. Head down, he ran blindly, stumbling forward as he struck the ore-dump, and beating out with his hands the sparks that scorched his clothing. The smoke appeared to roll higher from the ground here, and the coughing soldier crept up beneath it, breathing the hot air, and feeling as though his entire body were afire. Mason, his countenance black and unrecognizable, his shirt soaked with blood, peered into his face.

"Hell, ain't it!" he sputtered, "but you're a dandy, all right."

"Is Hampton dead?"

"I reckon not. Got hit bad, though."

Brant cast one glance into the white, unconscious face of his rival, and acted with the promptness of military training.

"Whip off your shirt, Mason, and tie it around your face," he commanded. "Lively now!"

He bound his silk neckerchief across Hampton's mouth, and lifted the limp form partially from the ground. "Help me to get him up. There, that will do. Now keep as close as you can so as to steady him if I trip. Straight ahead—run for it!"

"I Read It in Your Face" He Insisted, "It Told of Love."

They sprang directly into the lurid flames, bending low, Brant's hands grasping the inert form lying across his shoulder. They dashed stumbling through the black, smouldering lane beyond. Halfway down this, the ground yet hot beneath their feet, the vapor stifling, but with clearer breaths of air blowing in their faces, Brant tripped and fell. Mason beat out the smouldering sparks in his clothing, and assisted him to stagger to his feet once more. Then together they bore him slowly down below the first fire-line.

CHAPTER XXIII.
The Door Closes.

Totally exhausted, the two men dropped their heavy burden on the earth. Mason swore as the blood began dripping again from his wound, command.

"Sims, if there is any water in your canteen, hand it over. Good; here, Marshal, use this. Now, Sims, note what I say carefully, and don't waste a minute. Tell the first sergeant to send a file of men up here with some sort of a litter, on the run. Then you ride to the Herndon house—the yellow house where the roads fork, you remember—and tell Miss Naida Gillis (don't forget the name) that Mr. Hampton has been seriously wounded, and we are taking him to the hotel. Can you remember that?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then off with you, and don't spare the horse."

He was gone instantly, and Brant began bathing the pallid, upturned face.

"You'd better lie down, Marshal," he commanded. "You're pretty weak from loss of blood, and I can do all there is to be done until those fellows get here."

In 15 minutes they appeared, and five minutes later they were toiling slowly down to the valley, Brant walking beside his still unconscious rival. Here and there down the street, but especially about the steps of the Occidental, were gathered the discomfited vigilantes, busily discussing the affair, and cursing the watchful, silent guard. As these caught sight of the little party approaching there were shouts of derision. The sight and sound angered Brant.

"Carry Hampton to his room and summon medical attendance at once," he ordered. "I have a word to say to those fellows."

Seeing Mr. Wynkoop on the hotel porch, Brant said to him: "Miss Spencer informed me that you saw a man leap from the back window of the Occidental. Is that true?"

The missionary nodded.

"Good; then come along with me. I intend breaking the back of this lynching business right here and now."

He strode directly across the street to the steps of the Occidental, his clothing scarcely more than smouldering rags. The crowd stared at him sullenly; then suddenly a reaction came, and the American spirit of fair play, the frontier appreciation of bull-dog courage, burst forth into a confused murmur, that became half a cheer. Brant did not mince his words.

"Now, look here, men! If you want any more trouble, we're here to accommodate you. Fighting is our trade, and we don't mind working at it. But I wish to tell you right now, and straight off the handle, that you are simply making a parcel of fools of yourselves. Slavin has been killed, and nine out of ten among you are secretly glad of it. He was a curse to this camp, but because some of his friends and cronies—thugs, gamblers and dive keepers—accuse Bob Hampton of having killed him, you start in blindly to lynch Hampton, never even waiting to find out whether the charge is the truth or a lie. You act like sheep, not American citizens. Now that we have pounded a little sense into some of you, perhaps you'll listen to the facts, and if you must hang some one, put your rope on the right man. Bob Hampton did not kill Red Slavin. The fellow who did kill him climbed out of the back window of the Occidental here, and got away, while you were chasing the wrong man. Mr. Wynkoop saw him, and so did your school teacher, Miss Spencer."

Then Wynkoop stepped gamely to the front. "All that is true, men. I have been trying ever since to tell you, but no one would listen. Miss Spencer and I both saw the man jump from the window; there was blood on his right arm and hand. He was a misshapen creature whom neither of us ever saw before, and he disappeared on a run up that ravine. I have no doubt he was Slavin's murderer."

"Now, you fellows, think that over," said Brant. "I intend to post a guard until I find out whether you are going to prove yourselves fools or men, but if we sail in again those of you who start the trouble can expect to get hurt, and pay for the piper. That's all."

In front of the hotel porch he met his first sergeant coming out.

"What does the doctor say about Hampton?"

"A very bad wound, sir; but not necessarily fatal; he has regained consciousness."

"Has Miss Gillis arrived?"

"I don't know, sir; there's a young woman cryin' in the parlor."

The lieutenant leaped up the steps and entered the house. But is was Miss Spencer, not Naida, who sprang to her feet.

"Oh, Lieut. Brant; can it be truly you! How perfectly awful you look! Do you know if Mr. Hampton is really going to die? I came here just to find out about him, and tell Naida. She is almost frantic, poor thing."

Though Brant doubted Miss Spencer's honesty of statement, his reply was direct and unhesitating. "I am informed that he has a good chance to live, and I have already dispatched word to Miss Gillis regarding his condition. I expect her at any moment."

"How very nice it was of you! Oh, I trembled so when you first went to face those angry men! I don't see how you ever dared do it. I did wish that either Mr. Moffat or Mr. McNeil could have been here to go with you. Before Brant could reply his attentive ear caught the sound of a light footstep in the hallway. He met Naida just without, pale and tearless. Both her hands were extended to him unreservedly.

"Tell me, will he live?"

"The doctor thinks yes."

"Thank God! Oh, thank God!" She pressed one hand against her heart to control its throbbing. "You cannot know what this means to me. Her eyes seemed now for the first time to mark his own deplorable condition. "And you? You have not been hurt, Lieut. Brant?"

He smiled back into her anxious eyes. "Nothing that soap and water and a few days' retirement will not wholly remedy. My wounds are entirely upon the surface. Shall I conduct you to him?"

She bowed, apparently forgetful that one of her hands yet remained imprisoned in his grasp. "If I may go, yes. I told Mrs. Herndon I should remain here if I could be of the slightest assistance."

They passed up the staircase side by side, exchanging no further speech. Once she glanced furtively at his face, but its very calmness kept the words upon her lips unuttered. At the door they encountered Mrs. Guffy, her honest eyes red from weeping.

"This is Miss Gillis, Mrs. Guffy," explained Brant. "She wishes to see Mr. Hampton if it is possible."

"Sure an' she can thet. He's been askin' after her, an' thet pretty face would kape any man in gud spirits, I'm thinkin'. Step roight in, miss."

She held the door ajar, but Naida paused, glancing back at her motionless companion, a glint of unshed tears showing for the first time in her eyes. "Are you not coming also?"

"No, Miss Naida. It is best for me to remain without, but my heart goes with you."

Then the door closed between them.

CHAPTER XV.—He fails to discover her identity.

CHAPTER XVI.—Brant accompanies Naida home from the dance. On the way she informs him as to who she is, and that she is to meet Hampton. Brant meets Hampton with her, and the men make an appointment to meet the following morning.

CHAPTER XVII.—Brant and Hampton meet. Hampton informs the lieutenant that his attentions to Naida must cease, and proclaims an authority over her that justifies the statement. Brant tells Hampton of the presence of Silent Murphy, and the fact that Red Slavin receives government messages for him.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Miss Spencer called on Bob Hampton. Tells him of a red-faced stranger mistaking her for Naida.

CHAPTER XIX.—Hampton interviews Red Slavin. Finds that he is an ex-trooper in the Seventh cavalry. It was Slavin's and Murphy's testimony that more than ten years before had convicted Robert Nolan, then a captain in the Seventh, of the murder of Maj. Brant, Sr. Hampton attempts to force a confession from Slavin. Slavin insists it is Murphy he wants, and Murphy has left. In a scuffle Slavin is killed by a knife thrust.

CHAPTER XX.—Hampton surrenders to Buck Mason, marshal. Mob attempts to capture him. Mason and his prisoner escape to a hill and defend themselves. Mob lights fire to burn them out.

Tariff Reduction by Treaty.

The goods imported from Germany are virtually under the new agreement allowed to enter at the value certified by the German chambers of commerce. Thus the duty on German goods is less than that exacted upon the products of other countries, which are subject to an ad valorem rate of duty, because the lower the value at which imports are appraised the less the duty. Until we allow France, England and other countries the same favor it can hardly be called a square deal. The Manufacturers' association and the standpatters object to this agreement with Germany because it thus reduces the rate of duty in this round-about way.—Salem (Ill.) Democrat.

Wouldn't It Be Better?

The constitution of the United States wisely provides that all measures for the raising of revenue shall originate in the house of representatives. This is because the house of representatives is supposed to be closer to the people than any other body. Almost without exception our experience has shown that when matters like this are left to the state department the United States gets the worst of it. Wouldn't it be better to adhere strictly to the spirit as well as to the letter of the constitution and let congress pass on all these matters? —Cedar Rapids Republican.

CHOICE FROM RELIGIOUS FIELDS

A BEEHIVE ON STILTS.

How the Natives of Uganda Gave Shelter to Their Church Bell.

Marvelous are the efforts made by the pioneer missionary in heathen lands to secure a suitable place of worship for the native church. As a rule, the converts themselves are the first to turn church builders, and very creditable erections are the result.

BELL TOWER.

Sometimes the native Christians are even more ambitious, and erect a tower for the church bell. The bell tower at Nameremhe, Uganda, is certainly a curiosity. It has been called "a beehive on stilts," for it closely resembles that familiar article. However, it serves a useful purpose in calling the people to worship; and the converts themselves are proud of their imposing bell tower.

AN IDOL DESTROYER IN INDIA.

Hindu Convert Shows That He Has No Fear of Images.

The days when men and women bow down to images of wood and stone are numbered. The progress of civilization cannot fail to drive out ignorant superstitions, but only Christ can bring in the true light of life. Many, even those who refuse to surrender to Jesus Christ, are becoming enemies of idolatry. Rev. Wm. Waller, a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal church in the Central provinces of India, writes of a Hindu living in Kampti who has earned the name of "Idol Destroyer."

For years a hideous object, much bedaubed with red paint, was seated in a large niche in the wall of his house; and every day offerings were made and prayers were said before it. This idol (Mahdeo) was brought from a venerable temple on the banks of the sacred Ganges, over a thousand miles away, and the villagers counted the possessors of it very fortunate. But Christian preachers came and told of Him who seeks to be worshiped in spirit and in truth. Then this Hindu saw his idol in a new light, and so repulsive did it appear that he took up the helpless image and flung it into the river. The people expected to see the man die for such a sacrilege. It was a supreme moment when with a most natural splash Mahdeo went down to the bottom and the waters closed over it. Surely a bolt from the blue would strike the audacious perpetrator of such a deed! But he is very much alive to-day, prosperous and happy.

Not long ago he was challenged to face another idol. To show his contempt he spat upon it, and trampled upon it with his boots—a necessary precaution for himself, but a most intolerable insult to the idol, says Dr. Delavan Pierson, in Record of Christian Work. It is a significant sign of the times that the people did not set upon him. On the contrary, in a village not far off, the villagers are much incensed at the apathy and indifference of the village idol, from whom they received no help during a recent outbreak of sickness. Too much afraid to do anything themselves, they have appealed to this "destroyer of idols" to come and cast the village idol away.

Mrs. Sage Honored.

Matthews, secretary of the British and Foreign Sailors' society, on behalf of that society, and in the name of the king, asked the president (Mr. C. A. Stoddard) to present Mrs. Sage with a bust of Nelson, mounted on oak, taken from the timbers of Admiral Lord Nelson's former flagship, Victory.

Over 24,000 of these volumes of Scriptures were circulatetd by colporters.

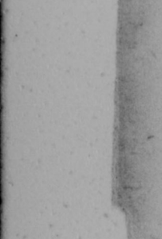
Successful Marriage Only Possible Between Affinities

By H. SPENCER LEWIS,
President of the New York Institute for Psychical Research.



MORE and more we hear of "affinities," "soul-mates" and other terms applied to cases wherein true love has never existed and never could exist. The true meanings of these terms are distorted to fit unusual circumstances, and very few really understand what these spiritual terms mean. It is true that if all marriages were based upon true affinities there would be more happiness in marriage. The trouble at present is not with the divorce laws, but with the marriage laws. Were the marriage laws proper there would be little need for divorce laws of any kind.

Affiniites are two souls, two spiritual beings, each having a like nature, like abilities, and possessing the same quality of love. They are one whole, separated at birth and incomplete until joined again in marriage. No discord, no opposite thinking or feeling must exist between them. An affinity must be the "other half—the spiritual complement" of our souls.

Perfect health is necessary for an affinity. True love is also neccessary. If these do not exist there can be no affinity. The mind must be pure, the thoughts must be spiritual, above material planes, and must come from a mind that is wholly devoted to love and sacred faithfulness.

There can be no successful marriage unless the principals are affinities to some degree. The greatest crime of the world at present is the lax marriage laws. The greatest obstacle to the world's progress is the easy manner in which two people may marry, live together and bring into this world such children as will in the future weaken the nations.

Trial marriages will not bring about the desirable results; they merely settle the physical questions of marriage, leaving the spiritual, the sacred questions unsolved. The only rational method is that of forcing a certain length of courtship, of acquaintance, between the man and woman.

Should Wives Have Salaries?

By MRS. LEONARD MARSHALL.

The man who marries rarely counts the cost—in any sense of the word! Wives even at best are expensive articles, and two people or more cannot live as cheaply as one. There are a thousand incidental expenses in housekeeping which a man never troubles about. Those are aptly termed in French les faux frais. It is a sad fact that many of the tragedies of married life are attributable to money troubles. The woman who has no money of her own and no means of earning any is indeed a slave. However kind her lord may be, there are many little trifles which a woman needs for her own particular happiness and for his, if he only knew it. Pin-money is an elastic term. A box of powder, a bottle of perfume, a ribbon, or a pair of gloves often go down in the housekeeping book as turpentine and beeswax, laundry or such-like items which a man is powerless to observe or disintegrate. Little deceptions grows apace, and a trifling cause will sometimes culminate in a disastrous effect. Therefore it is best to sail straight from the first. Men are afraid of granting us new privileges, and now we wives claim—oh, powers that be!—nothing more nor less than a salary! And if not, why not? Where is the housekeeper who would undertake the arduous duties that fall to a wife's portion on "nothing a year, paid quarterly?" A man falls in love with some lovely hothouse plant of a girl who has hitherto lived in an enchanted atmosphere of adoration. He takes it for granted—Heaven knows why—that she can cook and keep a house. He is going to keep her—probably for better, possibly for worse—and how grateful she has cause to be!

The post of housekeeper is terminable at a month's notice, but the ill-treated wife has no redress. Therefore she should, whilst expecting a reasonable increase, have a permanent salary secured on the earnings or income. Women slave from June until January with never a spot of blue in their sky. If they need clothes to cover themselves they must beg for weeks, smarting under the humiliation of being denied their dues! The men who do this are not necessarily bad husbands; they are sometimes thoughtless, sometimes thrifty. They do not even realize the cost of keeping a wife. It is always the same story; the woman's soul ground down, degraded, and when the fervid spirit makes a dash for deliverance the laws men make for men rise up like an impassable barrier between the woman and her heart's desire.

But if we adjust the finance more equally the salaried wife assumes the position of the wife who has a "dot." She can hand back the money, and throw all the mechanism of domestic machinery into confusion; she becomes a power and takes her proper place in the family, not on suffrance, but as an equal. To be kept clothed, fed and housed, pour l'amour de Dieu, and work like any servant, is no longer good enough for the daughters of our century; they can claim to be something better than a drudge or a pretty golden toy. They are women who have learned the secret working of the world's harmonies, companionable, trusty, and loyal comrades; they have learned to look beyond their own vanity into the hearts of men, and they can read the struggle between the longing for high ideals and the craving for the earth Life that is so infinitely pathetic and makes good women so mereiful to their brothers, lovers and husbands!

Influence of the Theater

By WILLIAM D. HOWELLS,
Author and Editor.

The theater is a tremendous engine in our civilization.

The extent to which it enters into the lives of the people is shown by the crowds at the playhouses—there must be not far from 250,000 persons in the New York theaters every evening.

The influence of such an institution cannot be neutral.

It must be either good or bad.

Whether it is one or the other depends of course upon the play and the individual.

I should say that on the whole the lesson of the theater has a permanent influence for good.

Alarm Clack In Her Stocking.

Just because an alarm clock was so indelicate as to start its clamor of "ting-a-ling-ling" while reposing in the stocking of pretty Edith F. Wilder she was arrested by a department store detective on the charge of larceny. With her was her chum, Blanche Dunn, who also was arrested. It was a most dramatic moment for the two pretty West End girls, who were defying with flashing eyes the charges of the store detective. It was about the moment when the girls seemed to be winning their point that the alarm clock went on its wild tell-tale ramble, and the girls were arrested.

UNION THANKSGIVING SERVICES IN OAKLAND

Text of Sermon Preached in St. Paul's Church by Rev. E. Manges.

SERVICES WERE WELL ATTENDED

Special Music Was Excellently Rendered By Combined Choirs of the Several Churches.

"I will offer to Thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving and will call upon the name of the Lord."—Ps. 116:17.

From this text in St. Paul's M. E. church this morning Rev. E. Manges, pastor of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, preached the annual Thanksgiving sermon to the congregations of the several churches of Oakland.

Special music for the occasion was rendered by the combined choirs of the Methodist, Lutheran and Presbyterian churches, the services being union in nature.

In his sermon Rev. Manges said in part:

"Beloved in the Lord, we are assembled here today, at the recommendation of President Roosevelt, to keep our national Sabbath—a day of National thanksgiving and prayer to Almighty God for the many blessings we have enjoyed during the year that has passed since last Thanksgiving Day, and to implore His favor and mercy for the coming year.

"The origin of Thanksgiving Day dates back to the time of the first settlers of New England, when, in a time of great despondency it was proposed, in one of their public assemblies, to appoint a day of fast. An old farmer arose, spoke of their provoking Heaven with their complaints, reviewed their mercies, showed that they had much to be thankful for, and moved that instead of appointing a day of fasting they should appoint a day of thanksgiving.

"As a Christian people we could not [illegible] otherwise than observe the day. In the principles of our holy religion is obedience to those who are in authority over us. The apostle says: 'Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers,' and assigns as a reason for this subjection: 'For there is no power but of God.' The powers that be are ordained of God.

"It is also highly appropriate that a portion of this National Sabbath should be set apart for public worship, that there should be a meeting together in solemn assembly and that all with one accord unite in thanksgiving and prayer to Him to whom we owe our being and in whose keeping we are as individuals and as a nation. We have accordingly come together in this public manner to acknowledge our indebtedness, as a people, to the protecting care of Him whose power is infinite and unitedly beseech Him to continue to us His favor and blessing.

"According to the order observed by the pastors of our town, it is made my duty to appear before you and preach a sermon this morning. It is therefore, not of my choosing, but is a case where there is no choice.

"The time and circumstances require that I should direct your thought to the consideration of those blessings which have come to us as a nation and to those tokens of Divine favour which have characterized the past year and which call for special expressions of gratitude.

"The Psalmist says, 'hitherto the Lord hath helped us.' He has helped us hitherto in every crisis of our history: through the days of the Revolution, through the days of our Civil strife and then through our little unpleasantness with Spain. Hitherto the Lord hath helped us and henceforth will be 'our refuge and strength; a very present help in trouble,' if we but implicity obey and trust in Him.

"Although we selected the theme for our address from one of the Psalms we cannot well do better than take the President's proclamation as our text.

"The first thing the President mentions for which we should be thankful is that during the past year we have been free from famine. Instead of sending a famine upon us God has caused the earth to respond bountifully to the efforts of the farmer to produce crops, which has given us a plenteous supply of all kinds of grain and vegetables in sufficient quantities to meet all our requirements and some to spare for those who have them not. Think of the famines that devastated different parts of India within the recollection of some of us assembled here. India suffered terribly in 1865 and 1866. About one million of her people perished from starvation in Bengal and Orissa. In 1868-9 about a million and a half died in Bombay, Madras, Mysore and adjoining provinces. You and I know nothing about famine. There has been want in different portions of our country, it is true, but not for lack of supplies, but the lack of transportation facilities.

"We have been free from pestilence; from malignant and widely destructive diseases; no epidemics of yellow fever or diphtheria which devastated whole communities and brought desolation to households along in the fifties. God in His great goodness has spared us from the pestilence such as he visited on the Israelites and other nations, though we deserved them as much as they. For instance, the pestilence which befell the Israelites of which we read in II Samuel, 24th chapter. In three days' time there died from Dan to Bersheba seventy thousand men. Josephus says that while one was burying his friend, he himself would fall into the grave. That must have been an awful time. The one great plague of our fair land has carried a hundred thousand or more victims into untimely graves. The President has said nothing about this. We do not say it in a spirit of faultfinding. It has desolated thousands of homes and has been more cruel than war. After the war the widows and orphans are cared for by the Government. Not so with those who have been made widows and orphans by the drink devil.

"The President mentions war. We have been free from war. General Sherman said, 'war is hell.' Some of you know what war is. It is an awful calamity to befall any nation. When we think of the expenditure of billions of money and the lives of thousands of young men in our Civil strife we have cause to shudder. We are at peace with the rest of mankind. This fact calls for thanksgiving. God will be pleased with our thanks, I believe, more than with our continually asking Him for this, that and the other thing."

GOV. WARFIELD WILL NOT MINCE MATTERS

His Message to Legislature Will Be a Plain Spoken Document.

MR. GAITHER SURELY HAD WON

Election That Deprived of Fruits of Victory Was a Farce—What Figures Shows—Plum Tree Gossip.

BALTIMORE, Md, Nov. 23.—The indications are that the fur will fly early in the session of the next legislature. Gov. Warfield has announced that he will send a message that will hit out squarely from the shoulder and throw light on certain matters which he thinks the public should know. Certain recommendations made in previous messages, which were ignored at the time, will again be a part of the paper, and vigorous language will be employed by the governor in setting forth his views. In other words, Warfield will squarely throw down the gauntlet and practically demand that the general assembly enact certain measures, such as a corrupt practices act and a more economical administration of the state's finances. The governor intimated that the message will probably create a mild sensation, just as his famous message on the disfranchisement amendment did several years ago. The incoming legislature is a dyed-in-the-wool organization body, and the members cannot be expected to take kindly to any strictures upon the conduct of commonwealth affairs by Gov. Warfield. On the other hand, the general assembly and the senate in particular may be relied upon to hit back and hit back vigorously. So it can be readily seen that breakers are ahead and the feud between Warfield and the organization is by no means at an end.

That George R. Gaither was elected Governor of Maryland on the 5th of this month, according to the popular will, was shown on the face of the official returns made public this week. According to the supervisors of elections there were counted 196,503 ballots. The total registration, according to the latest available information, is 270,752, and these figures do not include the supplemental registration in the city last spring and the fall registration in the city and counties. It is safe to conclude that the total registration in Maryland is 300,000, and in figuring out a calculation showing the discrepancy between the vote counted and the vote registered, the strength of the socialists and prohibitionists must be taken into consideration. The combined vote of these two parties did not exceed 7,000 and deducting this from the estimated registration the total vote of the two big parties is 293,000. Deduct from this the vote counted—196,503—and there remains 96,000, representing the stay-at-home and the rejected vote, mostly the latter. The total registered colored vote of Maryland is a trifle over 50,000, and it is assumed that 25,000 of these votes were counted. Accepting this figure, the returns show then that 71,000 white voters in Maryland either stayed away from the poles or had their ballots rejected. It is safe to assume that of this number 50,000 voted and had their ballot rejected. Of this 50,000 it is safe to assume that the democratic judges, with the connivance of crooked republican officials, threw out 9,000 that were for Gaither.

Crothers on the face of the official returns received 102,000 votes and Gaither 94,000. Of the 50,000 white votes rejected it is safe to estimate that Gaither lost 30,000 and Crothers 20,000. Therefore, figuring on this basis, the popular will of the people would have presented this result.

Gaither (official vote)	94,000
White rejected vote	30,000
Colored rejected vote	25,000
Total	149,000
Crothers (official vote)	102,000
White rejected vote	20,000
Total	122,000

Therefore, if the intention of the voter at the last election had been counted Mr. Gaither would have won a sweeping victory over his democratic opponent. That the election was one of the most crooked held in years in this state is admitted even by some of the ring democrats, who are today chuckling over the fact that they were able to purchase republican election officials thus defeat the will of the people. It is predicted that the last election will mark the beginning of another revolt against democrats and the upheaval of 1895, which placed the republicans in power, will be duplicated again in 1911.

Representative J. F. C. Talbott, who was a candidate in the primaries for the United States Senate, is much wrought up over the charge that he was only in the fight to keep Baltimore county from going to Warfield. This accusation Talbott hotly resents, and he asserts that he was a bona fine candidate and had made no deals with John Walter Smith or any other candidate, and a story told of a little dinner prior to election tends to show that Talbott feels sore over the fact that young Gorman supported Col. Smith. The story, as told by the press correspondent, is that Talbott in the course of a speech turned to young Gorman and said: "After all I did for your father, you ought to be behind me in this fight." Young Gorman preserved his usual calm demeanor and quietly retorted: "Well, I guess you were well repaid for all you did for my father." At this point others at the dinner intervened and what promised to be an ugly battle of words between Talbott and the son of the late senator and state leader was averted. Talbott asserts that he was shabbily treated by the organization, and that the impression which it allowed to be created that he was in the fight to beat Warfield caused him to lose many votes.

Already the politicians are busily at work in behalf of candidates for offices to be filled by the governor. One of the most important of these plums is the board of police commissioners for Baltimore city. During the past four years the city bosses have been unable to use the police force on election day and this has proven a great handicap. It was for the divorcing of the police department from politics that Warfield first came under the ban of the "old guard." It is expected that the incoming governor will name a board that will feel justified in allowing the police to assist in the work of vote-getting during campaigns and on election day. Of one thing the politicians feel sure, and that is that only "regular" democrats will receive the plums and that independents will have little or nothing to do with the Crothers administration.

THE DEATH RECORD.

J. FRANK LEGGE.

Mr. J. F. Legge, aged 53 years, terminal agent of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad at Washington, D. C., died at his home in Washington at ten o'clock Sunday night after a long illness. He was at one time agent of the B. & O. at Cumberland, and later superintendent of the Parkersburg and Wheeling division, which then extended between Cumberland, Parkersburg and Wheeling. He had a continuous service with the railroad for forty years, with the exception of several years that he was engaged in business. He is survived by a widow and four sons.

The funeral of Mr. Legge occurred yesterday (Wednesday), the interment being made at Shepherestown, West Va., the home of his widow.

His brother, Mr. George W. Legge, of Oakland, left here Tuesday afternoon and met the funeral party at Shenandoah Junction, accompanying the remains to Shepherdstown.

JOHN HENRY HOLZSHU.

Mr. John Henry Holzshu of Cumberland, Md., died Monday night at 8.30 at his home on North Centre street. Death was due to uraemic poisoning, resultant from typhoid fever. He was unconcious for about twenty-four hours before he passed away. Mr. Holzshu was well known throughout the western sec- of Maryland, and general regret will follow the news of his death. He stood very high in the Masonic circles, and was a member of a number of other secret organizations. He was a member of the German Lutheran church. It is said that he was one of the best known, most successful and most popular men in Allegany county.

GUARDED JEFFERSON DAVIS MANY YEARS AGO

Rev. J. B. Shoup Recently visited Prison of Confederacy's President

AT OLD FORTRESS MONROE

He Was Not Allowed to Enter, Much to His Disappointment—A Reminiscence of the Distinguished Southerner.

The following article, taken from the Norfolk (Va.) Ledger-Dispatch of Nov. 7th, relative to a recent visit to Fortress Monroe by Rev. J. B. Shoup, recently of Bittinger, Garrett county, will be read with interest by many Garrett countains who are acquainted with Rev. Shoup:

Among this week's visitors to the Jamestown Exposition has been one for whom this section of the country holds great interest. Venerable in appearance, with flowing white beard, he might have been seen looking through Fortress Monroe as though memories of other days were crowding in upon him, and as though he were living over again events that had to do with himself, and the ground upon which he was treading. He might have been noticed to stop in front of the historic Davis casement and look intently at it, as though it held peculiar interest for him. He would have gone into it, but was not permitted to do so. His disappointment was apparent.

Forty-two years ago this man had an intimate association with this erstwhile prison house, which he now desired to enter. In it he guarded one of the most distinguished prisoners the government of any country ever held—Jefferson Davis, President of the Southern Confederacy.

The visitor was Rev. J. B. Shoup, of Fitzgerald, Ga., now a minister of the Lutheran Church, but during the civil strife a lieutenant in one of the batteries of the Third Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, which held Fortress Monroe during and just subsequent to the war. In conversation with Mr. Shoup before he left the city—he came up to Norfolk after his visit to Old Point Comfort—he talked most entertainingly of his association and acquaintance with Mr. Davis. He said he guarded the famous prisoner for six months and in that time became intimately acquainted with him, their relations being exceedingly pleasant. As a commissioned officer he occupied the gun room adjoining the prison proper and held the key which locked the ex-President within.

He talked much with Mr. Davis, who at times invited him to eat with him, and thus together they shared quite a number of meals. At other times he took the great Southerner out to walk in the fort for exercise and had opportunity to know him well. Said Mr. Shoup:

"He was the best informed man as to this country—especially as to its prominent people—I ever knew, and he was ready to converse on any subject. No visitor, American or foreign—and he had quite a number of foreign visitors—brought up a subject with which he seemed unfamiliar. He showed me the manuscript of the defense he had prepared and intended to make had he been brought to trial. He did not read it or permit me to read it, but I could see that it was an extended document, probably a hundred pages. I was not with Mr. Davis during any of the unpleasant features of his imprisonment. His intense love for the cause for which he had stood was apparent, yet when he heard of the assassination of President Lincoln he said to his little military family, as it was then, 'I have lost the best friend I had in the United States.'"

Mr. Shoup found Fortress Monroe much the same in some particulars, but very notable changes in the buildings both in and outside the fort. The changes he found to have taken place in Norfolk in forty-two years were many and very marked.

Annual Meeting Horticulture Society.

To the Editor THE REPUBLICAN:

The Tenth Annual Meeting of the Maryland State Horticultural Society will be held in the Fifth Regiment Armory, Baltimore, throughout the days and evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday, December 3rd and 4th. Attendance at these meetings will well repay any one interested in horticulture or the farm.

Last year's exhibits were exceedingly fine, and to this result Garrett county contributed to no small extent. This year we cannot repeat our large exhibit of apples, but cannot our farmers find other products worthy to be sent? Potatoes, squash, celery, roots of any kind, and nuts, will be gladly received, and exhibited.

I will be at Mr. George Giessman's in Oakland, on Monday afternoon, and Tuesday, December 2nd and 3rd of court week and any products of the farm left there will be packed at once and forwarded for the owner, without expense, and he will receive the credit of the exhibit.

I trust that your readers will make an effort to send something from Garrett, and that we may have some representation.

Very truly yours,
W. MCCULLOH BROWN.

A PROPOSED NEW CORPORATION LAW.

Features of The Bill Which is Intended to Change Old Methods.

Mr. Martin Lehmayer, who has been re-elected to the House of Delegates for the third time from Baltimore City, has prepared an important bill affecting the corporation laws of Maryland. The bill, with some slight alterations, embraces the first 83 sections of the act reported by the Corporation Commission to the last legislature. The commission's full report covered 301 sections.

Mr. Lehmayer's bill covers 22 typewritten pages. The general provisions of the law are in accordance with the trend of legislation in the most progressive states of the Union relating to the organization and management of corporations. The important features of the bill are as follows.

First—Any three persons can incorporate, one only being required to be a resident of Maryland.

Second—One director only is required to be a resident of Maryland.

Third—Ten per cent. of the stockholders have the right to inspect the books.

Fourth—Business can be commenced before any capital is paid in and before subscription to any capital stock.

Fifth—Charters are perpetual unless otherwise declared by the incorporators.

Sixth—Preferred stock can be issued and the transferability of preferred and common stock can be limited by the corporation.

Seventh—Stock may be purchased in other corporations.

Eighth—The provisions covering amendments to charters are very broad.

Ninth—Capital stock can be paid for in money, property or services; the value of such property or services shall be passed upon by a majority of the stockholders, and such valuation of such stockholders is conclusive upon all creditors.

Tenth—Foreign corporations must obtain permission to do business in Maryland; must pay an annual license tax; must file annual reports, and must keep an agent in the state on whom process can be served.

Eleventh—Voting trusts are expressly authorized.

Important provisions in the contemplated act are sections 63 to 67, providing for the taxation of "ordinary business corporations." The act defines ordinary business corporations to be those "which enjoy no special privileges or franchises, whose business is not affected with a public interest or which do not, under the laws of this state, pay a state tax as a franchise tax upon their gross earnings or receipts." Insurance companies, building or homestead associations, state, national or savings banks and all moneyed institutions are excluded.

Every ordinary business corporation after the year 1908 is exempted from taxation on its shares, nor are its shares taxable in the hands of the holders thereof.

Every such business corporation is required to pay annually to the state treasurer after 1908 an annual franchise tax as follows: Twenty-five dollars for every full $50,000 up to $500,000; if the amount of such capital stock is more than $500,000, and not more than $5,000,000, then the corporation shall pay an additional amount equal to one-fortieth of one per cent. on the excess; if more than $5,000,000, the additional annual tax shall be at the rate of $30 for every $1,000,000 on the last-named excess.

Section 64 provides as follows:

Every ordinary business corporation shall be subjected to taxation upon its property, real and personal, to the same extent as and not otherwise than a natural person engaged in similar business and owning such property would be subject. And the property, real and personal, of such corporations be assessed and the taxes thereon levied and collected in the same manner as if such property belonged to a natural person resident where the principal office of such corporation for the transaction of business is actually located.

Mr. Lehmayer has given the subject careful consideration, and believes that if such a law would be placed upon the statute books it would be of incalculable benefit to the city and state, and would tend to increase the commercial prestige of Baltimore city.

Nearly all the large mercantile corporations doing business in Maryland are incorporated outside of the state. Mr. Lehmayer's bill omits the provisions of the original report relating to the insurance companies, trust companies, telegraph companies, fraternal and beneficiary associations, surety, fidelity and guaranty companies, savings banks, and the other sections of the reports which aroused great opposition.

New York, New Jersey, Deleware, West Virginia, Maine, Virginia, Oklahoma, North Carolina, Alabama, Nevada, South Dakota, and Arizona all have modern corporation laws. Maryland is far behind every other state in her legislation upon this subject. This was recognized by the legislature of 1902, which authorized the appointment of a commission to revise the corporation laws of Maryland This commission reported in 1904 and 1906, but the reports were never adopted.

YEAR 1908 GLOOMY HERE AND ABROAD

English Astrologist Predicts Disaster in United States and Other Countries.

The year 1908 is to be one of trouble for the most persons, if Zadkiel, the London astrologer, has interpreted correctly the "voice of the stars." President Roosevelt, for instance, will find it difficult to carry out further measure of reform owing to the fact, apparently, that he was born October 27, 1858.

There is to be trouble in January in the colonies and in foriegn politics, and a new sensation is to come before the divorce court, but ironmongers, engineers and medical men born on January 24 are to have a good year. There are frequent references in his new almanac to railway discontent and accidents, political exitement and the position of the Government and trust wars and railways disasters and conflagrations will occur in the Eastern States of America during February. Some other events of the year that Zadkiel expects are:

April—Storms and misfortunes at sea, and political excitement, discord, and trbulence. The position of the British Government, neither happy nor secure. Fishermen, however, will catch a lot of fish.

May—Disasters on railways in the North and West of England and the Uuited States.

June—British railways will suffer from depreciation of stocks, accidents and discontent of their employees. British Government in a quandary.

July—Germany will hardly escape foreign and Colonial warfare, and the Kaiser must avoid dangerous places.

August—Trouble generally.

October—Extension of the trade of Great Britain; some wonderful new inventions. Ironworkers and shipping people prosperous.

November—Cases of cruelty to women before the magistrates. Poisoning cases in several countries. Unrest and plague in India. Trouble in Ireland, Morocco and Madrid.

Stomach troubles, Heart and Kidney ailments, can be quickly corrected with a prescription known to druggists everywhere as Dr. Shoop's Restorative. The prompt and surprising relief which this remedy immediately brings is entirely due to its Restorative action upon the controlling nerves of the Stomach, etc.

TOOK A RIDE WITH STATESMAN.

Squire McGibbons, in 1845, Enjoyed a Talk While Riding With Henry Clay.

When Squire W. H. McGibbons of Bruceton, W. Va., was a boy of 15 he was learning the trade of harness maker and saddle making at Frostburg, Md. This was about 1845. At the shop in which he worked considerable attention was paid to repairing whip lashes for stage drivers on the National pike. The lad thus got acquainted with many of the drivers, and often of a Saturday evening, when the stage was not crowded, a driver would take Mac up on his seat and allow him to ride on the coach to Cumberland, 11 miles distant. One certain Saturday evening he was about to climb up as usual beside the driver when he was stopped by the superintendent saying to him:

"You can't ride on this coach, Mac. It's chartered."

The boy stepped aside just as the occupant of the coach put his head out of the window and said:

"What's that? Who is it wants to ride on this coach?"

The superintendent explained that it was an apprentice boy who was in the habit of riding to Cumberland now and then with a driver, but that in this case he could just as well wait for another coach.

"Not at all," answered the passenger. "Not at all. Get right in here with me lad, get right in here."

He made the boy get inside the coach beside him. He was accompanied by his negro slave, whom he moved to a seat in the front of the coach so that he could talk the better to the new occupant. Young McGibbons was naturally a good deal disconcerted by his proximity to a person evidently of some distinction and wealth, although wholly unknown to him. And the black slave was clearly much entertained by his embarrassment.

But man and boy together had a delightful ride, the former asking many questions of the latter, and handing out good advice on how to conduct himself when he should have acquired his trade so as to become a useful member of society, and get along well in the world himself. Reaching Cumberland they quitted the coach together, when the elder said to young McGibbons, while putting out his hand:

"Well, we have reached the end of our journey. I go on to Washington. Good bye! I know your name, and I may tell you that my name is Henry Clay."

So it was the great Kentuckian that little Mac had been riding with and talking to. He was as nearly overcome with surprise as boys of that age usually are at anything. He never forgot the incident.

In recently recalling this episode the squire related another of Henry Clay that had happened at Brownsville, when the great statesman had come up the river from Pittsburg to that point and was waiting there a short time to get a stage for the national capital. He was accompanied by a well-dressed, intelligent negro slave. Pennsylvania was free soil. Some of the men of Brownsville got around the slave and telling him that, having got to Pennsylvania, he could not be returned to Kentucky against his will, urged him to assert his freedom. But the negro demurred; said he was perfectly satisfied. The pressure upon him continuing he put his hand into his trousers' pocket and, looking on the indifferently dressed white men around him, and at his own fine suit, said if any man in the crowd could show more money on the spot than he could he would agree to claim his freedom. No one took up his proposition, but withdrawing his hand he showed it full of gold coins. It was more money than the entire crowd had. That settled it. The black man was let alone.

HOW TO WATCH THE STOVE PIPE.

State Fire Marshal Gives Instructions to Guard Against Fires.

State Fire Marshal Lloyd T. MacGill, Jr., has issued a bulletin advising the people how best to guard against and to prevent fire loss. The Marshal says:

"The fires caused by errors in construction or lack of attention to the avenues for the escape of smoke from heaters, it is estimated, number in Maryland each year about 200, and the accruing loss is about $120,000.

"Two-thirds of this big loss could be saved if each householder, before severe weather sets in, has inspected and cleaned the flues in his or her house. Why not protect your property and its occupants by devoting 10 minutes to this commonest of all fire dangers?

"Fires from defective chimneys usually occur in the attic, and thus get a good start in the dry wood before discovery is made. Attics being difficult to reach with water bucket, the fire is likely to get beyond control quickly.

"The settling of the foundation of a house may open a crevice between the bricks or stones, enabling sparks to escape. Sometimes a new chimney in settling forms a crack because one side of it is supported by floor timbers.

"A chimney built on joists or a bracket is continually a source of danger, because of the liability of cracks being caused by springing of the timbers. Chimneys so built often have as their base a plank, and its only protection from sparks and heat is a layer of mortar on it. Many fires result from this cause.

"Some things to be remembered by builders and housewives are that:

"Poor mortar crumbles out, leaving openings.

"Nails driven into brick chimneys are likely to come out, leaving holes.

"A joist end should not rest in a chimney wall.

"Tile chimneys of all sorts are unsafe, because they are likely to crack off at the level of the roof, where cold air strikes them.

"A hood should make no offset to hold soot.

"A chimney top should be inspected and soot swept down and removed from below.

"A stovepipe must be cleaned frequently. Jarring the soot down is not enough. A scraper should be used inside to remove scales, and then it should be inspected, section by section, for rust holes, which might permit sparks to fly outward instead of upward.

"See that the pipe when up is sparktight throughout and is not pushed into the flue so as to choke it.

"An elbow in a stovepipe lessens the liability of particles of kindling or fuel being drawn from the chimney top and alighting still red-hot on the shingles. If such sparks are given elbow room they are likely to bump in making the turn and fall back harmless. While a fire is burning the air in a chimney travels up at the rate of three to six feet a second.

"Rag-filled holes cause fires.

"A stovepipe should not pass where it cannot be seen, as through a lath-and-plaster partition or through an attic or unused room, because openings in it may occur from rust or the parting of a seam or joint. In such cases the pipe becomes covered with a fluff, which is liable to ignite.

"A pipe should not pass through a wooden roof, window frame or siding of a summer kitchen. It is liable to become red-hot.

"No flue should be smaller than 8 by 8 inches, which is the length of a brick. If any green wood is used the flue should be 8 by 12 inches.

"The effective way to deal with the enormous loss caused by fires from defective flues is through a State building law, similar to that of North Carolnia, which controls the building of chimneys and many other details of architecture. This would cure the evil in 50 years."

DUEL OF SOUTHERN GENERALS.

Killing of Walker by Marmaduke and Its Effect on Confederate Fortunes.

"A duel between two confederate generals, almost in the midst of an important engagement, in the early stages of the civil war, had something to do with the final collapse of the southern cause," said an ex-confederate living in New York after his return from the Davis and J. E. B. Stuart memorial celebrations in Richmond, relates the New York Sun. "We were not as united as the new generation would have you believe.

"There was always a misunderstanding between the Richmond government and the trans-Mississippi department. Early in the conflict I was sent to Arkansas to learn the cause of the trouble in the leadership.

"Five men, whose names later became a part of the history of the cause, were at variance at a time when unity was essential. These men were Sterling Price, Marmaduke, Walker, Holmes and Fagan. Price was the idol of the Missouri troops. Marmaduke was a born soldier. Walker was a martinent. Holmes was uncertain in judgment. Fagan was a good fighter when he was discreetly directed.

"When I reached Arkansas these five men were before Helena for the purpose of wresting it from the enemy. It was a strategic position at the time. It is not necessary to go into the details of the story. The point is that the attack failed.

"It was a blow to the Richmond government early in the couse. The failure lay not with the soldiers but with the leader. Holmes had planned the fight. Events showed that he had no conception of the strength of the fortifications of the enemy or of the enemy's numbers.

"After the failure dissensions among the leaders increased. This was noticeably the case between Walker and Marmaduke.

"If I remember correctly Walker ranked Marmaduke. In one of the movements Walker had ordered the troops under his command to retreat. To Marmaduke was given the post of danger—covering the retreat. He was assured that at a certain point he would be reenforced by Walker.

"It was important that he should have this aid. When he arrived at the point not a man, save his own division, was to be seen. Not only that, but Walker had failed to communicate with him. Marmaduke extricated himself from the situation by a miracle.

"In several engagements that followed Walker, though still in command, held himself aloof from Marmaduke. The two men hated each other personally, but Marmaduke was enough of a soldier to let that pass at the time. Walker was sullen and sulky.

"Marmaduke sent an aide to ask Walker for orders. Walker refused to answer because, as he said, it was unmilitary for a superior officer to receive a verbal message from an inferior. Marmaduke reduced his request to writing and sent it. Walker never replied.

"After the troops had been rescued from the situation, for that is what it amounted to, Marmaduke, smarting under the conduct of Walker, informed Walker's superior of existing conditions and demanded that his troops be withdrawn from Walker's command. Failing in this Marmaduke said his resignation was ready.

"This was an interesting condition at such a time. I don't think it had its counterpart during the remainder of the war.

"Marmaduke's attitude widened the breach. Walker remained obdurate. Then came the climax.

"Marmaduke challenged Walker. The latter accepted. The affair was known only to a few. The meeting took place almost within sight of the soldiers.

"Marmaduke was an expert marksman. He killed his adversary the first shot. Think of such a thing at such a time!

"Marmaduke and his seconds were promptly arrested. Only for Walker's unpopularity Marmaduke would have been court-martialed. Through the influence of officials high in authority the affair was dropped, but it took time to restore the army to discipline. And when the time came the enemy had secured advantages which were maintained throughout.

"The Richmond government was charged with indifference to the situation beyond the Mississippi. It was due very largely to the lack of unity among the leaders in the west.

"By the time they had come to their senses the damage had been done. The south's defeat has been ascribed to many causes. One of them, not generally known, I have stated.

"All the participants in the Walker-Marmaduke duel are dead with the exception of Marmaduke's chief second, Col. John C. Moore. He is, or was a year ago, still living in Kansas City."

HEROINE OF CIVIL WAR.

Mrs. Elida Fowle Founded a Library with President Lincoln's Help.

A leading spirit in the celebration of Dorchester day was Mrs. Elida Rumsley Fowle. Mrs. Fowle has lived in Dorchester since the civil war. She is the first woman in the United States to found a free public library, which was erected in Washington on a grant of land obtained from the government, and was known as the "Soldiers' Free Library." She was also the first woman to be married before the house of representatives, an event which was attended by hundreds of the highest dignitaries of the land who had become acquainted with both Mrs. Fowle and her husband for the deep interest they displayed in the care of the union soldiers.

MRS. ELIDA RUMSLEY FOWLE.

At the time the civil war broke out Mrs. Fowle, who was then Elida Rumsley, was living in New York, but soon went to Washington, where she hoped to be enrolled with the army nurses under the charge of Dorothea Dix. But she was too young to obtain a recommission and then resolved to, as she herself says, "the next best thing."

Possessed of a beautifully sympathetic voice, she was one day traveling through one of the hospitals when someone asked for a song, and Mrs. Fowle started to sing. Her efforts were greeted with wild cheering and from that time on she believed that she had found her mission.

At all the hospitals about Washington her face and voice became familiar, and it was while engaged upon this work, when she heard the complaint that many of the soldiers spent their time in idly playing cards and telling useless stories, that she conceived the idea of founding a library for them.

With this object in view she went to President Lincoln, who promised her a site for the library, provided she could obtain the necessary sum to erect it.

Her voice was the only thing she could depend upon to raise money with so that together with Mr. Fowle she determined to give a series of concerts to raise the necessary fund for the library building.

President Lincoln allowed her the use of the Marine band at two of these concerts and within a very short time she managed to raise about $2,000.

Mrs. Fowle was only 18 years of age when this library was built, but it was soon stacked with books, which were freely given to the soldiers, who obtained them under their signature and a promise to return them.

At that time Mr. Fowle was employed in the navy department at Washington, but his tastes were very much in common with those of his fiancee, and she obtained no little support from him in all her endeavors.

Together they were members of the choir in the house of representatives and it was this circumstance that induced them to be married there.

On that occasion the floor and galleries were packed, fully 4,000 people being present. The bride was also requested to sing, "The Star Spangled Banner" immediately after the ceremony.

Australian Lyre Bird.

Of Australia's lyre bird a naturlist writes: "It imitates the notes and songs of other birds and reproduces a hissing noise similar to that uttered by an alarmed snake, and a sharp knocking sound like that produced by striking a tree trunk with a stick. All these sounds are uttered apparently for the bird's own amusement. The sounds of imitation include the calls and cries of every creature that is found in the localities which the lyre bird inhabits, including those of such noisy birds as the eagle and the laughing jackass. The lyre bird nearly always interposes snatches of its own song between its mimic cries."

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Rescue of Miss Spencer.

While Hampton lingered between life and death, assiduously waited upon by both Naida and Mrs. Guffy, Brant nursed his burns, far more serious than he had at first supposed, within the sanctity of his tent. Glencaid meanwhile recovered from its mania of lynch law, and even began exhibiting some faint evidences of shame over what was so plainly a mistake. And the populace were also beginning to exhibit no small degree of interest in the weighty matters which concerned the fast-culminating love affairs of Miss Spencer.

Almost from her earliest arrival the extensive cattle and mining interests of the neighborhood became aggressively arrayed against each other; and now, as the fierce personal rivalry between Messrs. Moffat and McNeil grew more intense, the breach perceptibly widened. While the infatuation of Rev. Mr. Wynkoop for this same fascinating young lady was plainly to be seen, his chances in the race were not seriously regarded by the more active partisans upon either side.

The regular patrons of the Miners' Retreat were backing Mr. Moffat to a man, while those claiming headquarters at the Occidental were equally ardent in their support of the prospects of Mr. McNeil. It must be confessed that Miss Spencer flirted outrageously and enjoyed life as she never had done in the effete east.

The Rev. Mr. Wynkoop always felt serenely confident of an uninterrupted welcome upon Sunday evenings after service, while the other nights of the week were evenly apportioned between the two more ardent aspirants.

On Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings the Miners' Retreat was a scene of wild hilarity, for it was then that Mr. Moffat was known to be comfortably seated in the Herndon parlor, relating gruesome tales of wild mountain adventure which paled the cheeks of his fair and entranced listener. Then on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights, on his yellow bronco, bedecked in all the picturesque paraphernalia of the boundless plains, revolver swinging at thigh, his wide sombrero shadowing his dare-devil eyes, the front of the gay Occidental blazed with lights and became crowded to the doors with enthusiastic herders drinking deep to the success of their representative.

It is no more than simple justice to the fair Phoebe to state that she was, as her aunt expressed it, "in a dreadful state of mind." Between these two picturesque and typical knights of plain and mountain she vibrated, unable to make deliberate choice. While laboring in this state of indecision late one Wednesday night Moffat tramped heavily into the Miners' Retreat and called Long Pete Lumley over into a deserted corner of the barroom.

"Well, Jack," the latter began expectantly, "hev ye rally got the cinch on that cowboy at last, hey?"

"Dern it all, Pete, I'm blamed if I know; leastwise, I ain't got no sure prove-up. I tell ye thet girl's just about the toughest piece o' rock I ever had any special call to assay. Ye see it's this way. She's got some durn down east notion that she's got ter be rescued, an' borne away in the arms of her hero like they do in them pesky novels the Kid's allers readin', and so I reckon I've got ter rescue her!"

"Rescue her from whut, Jack?"

"Well, ye see, Pete, maybe I'm partly to blame. I've sorter been entertainin' her nights with some stories regardin' road agents an' things o' thet sort, while, so fur, as I kin larn, thet blame chump of a McNeil hes been fillin' her up scandalous with Injuns, until she's plum got 'em on the brain. And now, I reckon as how it's got ter be Injuns."

"Whut's got ter be Injuns?"

"Why thet outfit whut runs off with her, of course. I reckon you fellers will stand in all right ter help pull me out o' this hole?"

Long Pete nodded.

"Well, Pete, this is 'bout whut's got ter be done, es near es I kin figger it out. You pick out maybe half a dozen good fellers who kin keep their mouths shet an' make injuns out of 'em. Then you lay fer her, say 'bout next Wednesday, out in them Carter woods, when she's comin' home from school. I'll kinder naturally happen 'long by accident 'bout the head o' the gulch, an' jump in an' rescue her. Sabe?"

Lumley gazed at his companion with eyes expressive of admiration. "By thunder, if you haven't got a cocoanut on ye, Jack! Lord, but thet ought to get her a flyin'! Any shootin'?"

"Sure!" Moffat's face exhibited a faint smile at these words of praise. "It wouldn't be no great shucks of a rescue without, an' this hes got ter be the real thing. Only, I reckon, ye better shoot high, so thar' won't be no hurt done."

When the two gentlemen parted a few moments later the conspiracy was fully hatched, all preliminaries perfected and the gallant rescue of Miss Spencer assured. Indeed, there is some reason now to believe that this desirable result was rendered doubly certain, for as Moffat moved slowly past the Occidental on his way home a person attired in chaps, and sombrero, and greatly resembling McNeil, was in the back room, breathing some final instructions to a few bosom friends.

"Now don't—eh—any o' you fellers—eh—go an' ferget the place. Jump in—eh—lively, just afore she—eh—gits ter thet thick bunch—eh—underbrush, whar' the trail sorter—eh—drops down inter the ravine. An' you chumps wanter—eh—git—yerselves up so she can't pipe any of ye off—eh—in this yere—eh—road-agent act. I tell ye, after what thet—eh—Moffat's bin a-pumpin' inter her, she's just got ter be—eh—rescued, an' in blame good style, er—eh—it ain't no go."

"Oh, you rest easy 'bout all thet, Bill," chimed in Sandy Winn, his black eyes dancing in anticipation of coming fun. "We'll git up the ornariest outfit whut ever hit the pike."

The long shadows of the late afternoon were already falling across the gloomy Carter woods, while the red sun sank lower behind old Bull mountain. Rev. Howard Wynkoop, who for more than an hour past had been vainly dangling a fishing line above the dancing waters of Clear creeks, now reclined dreamily on the soft turf of the high bank, his eyes fixed upon the distant sky line. His thoughts were on the flossy hair and animated face of the fair Miss Spencer, who he momentarily expected would round the edge of the hill, and so deeply did he become sunk in blissful reflection as to be totally oblivious to everything but her approach.

Just above his secret resting place, where the great woods deepen, and the gloomy shadows lie darkly all through the long afternoons, a small party of hideously painted savages skulked silently in ambush. Suddenly to their strained ears was borne the sound of horses' hoofs; and then, all at once, a woman's voice rang out in a single shrill, startled cry.

"Whut is up?" questioned the leading savage, hoarsely. "Is he a-doin' this little job all by hisself?"

"Dunno," answered the fellow next him, flipping his quirt uneasily; "but I reckon as how it's her as squealed, an' we'd better be gitting in ter hev our share o' the fun."

The "chief," with an oath of disgust, dashed forward and his band surged after. Just below them, and scarcely 50 feet away, a half-score of roughly clad, heavily bearded men were clustered in the center of the trail, two of their number lifting the unconscious form of a fainting woman upon a horse.

"Cervera's gang, by gosh!" panted the leading savage. "How did they git yere?"

"You bet! She's up again the real thing," ejaculated a voice beside him. "Let's ride 'em off the earth! Whoop!"

With wild yells to awaken fresh courage the whole band plunged headlong down the sharp decline, striking the surprised "road agents" with a force and suddenness which sent half of them sprawling. Revolvers flashed, oaths and shouts rang out fiercely, men clinched each other, striking savage blows. Lumley grasped the leader of the other party by the hair, and endeavored to beat him over the head with his revolver butt. Even as he uplifted his hand to strike the man's beard fell off and the two fierce combatants paused as though thunderstruck.

"Hold on yere, boy!" yelled Lumley. "This yere is some blame joke. These fellers is Bill McNeil's gang."

"By thunder! if it ain't Pete Lumley," ejaculated the other. "Whut did ye hit me fer, ye long-legged minin' jackass?"

The explanation was never uttered. Out from the surrounding gloom of underbrush a hatless, disheveled individual on foot suddenly dashed into the center of that hesitating ring of horsemen. With skillful twist of hit foot he sent a dismounted road agent spinning over backward and managed to wrench a revolver from his hand. There was a blaze of red flame, a cloud of smoke, six sharp reports, and a wild stampede of frantic horsemen.

Then Rev. Howard Wynkoop flung the empty gun disdainfully down into the dirt, stepped directly across the motionless outstretched body, and knelt humbly beside a slender, white-robed figure lying close against the fringe of bushes. Tenderly he lifted the fair head to his throbbing bosom and gazed directly down into the white, unconscious face. Even as he looked her eyes unclosed, her body trembling within his arms.

"Have no fear," he implored, reading terror in the expression of her face. "Miss Spencer—Phoebe—it is only I, Mr. Wynkoop.

"Oh, Howard—Mr. Wynkoop—it is all so strange, so bewildering; my nerves are so shattered! But it has taught me a great, great lesson. How could I have ever been so blind? I thought Mr. Moffat and Mr. McNeil were such heroes, and yet now in this hour of desperate peril it was you who flew gallantly to my rescue! It is you who are the true western knight!"

And Mr. Wynkoop gazed down into those grateful eyes and modestly confessed it true.

CHAPTER XXV.

The Parting Hour.

To Lieut. Brant these proved days of bitterness. He had called twice upon Hampton, both times finding the wounded man propped up in bed, very affable, properly grateful for services rendered, yet avoiding all reference to the one disturbing element between them.

Once he had accidentally met Naida, but their brief conversation left him more deeply mystified than ever, and later she seemed to avoid him altogether. One day he deemed her but an idle coquette; the next, a warm-hearted woman, doing her duty bravely. Yet through it all her power over him never slackened.

The end of this nervous strain came in the form of an urgent dispatch recalling N troop to Fort Abraham Lincoln by forced marches. The commander felt no doubt as to the full meaning of this message, and the soldier in him made prompt and joyful response. Brant had learned of the consolidation of the hostile savages, incited by Sitting Bull, into the fastness of the Big Horn range; he was aware that Gen. Cook was already advancing northward from the Nebraska line. Now he realized that he was to be a part of this chosen fighting force and his heart responded to the summons as to a bugle call in battle.

Instantly the little camp was astir, the men feeling the enthusiasm of their officers. With preparations well in hand, Brant's thoughts veered once again toward Naida. He rode down to the Herndon house with grave face and sober thought. He recalled long the plainly furnished room into which Mrs. Herndon ushered him to await the girl's appearance—the formal look of the old-fashioned hair-cloth furniture, the prim striped paper on the walls, the green shades at the windows, the clean rag carpet on the floor. The very stiffness chilled him, left him ill at ease. Then he heard the rustle of Naida's skirt and turned to meet her. She was pale from her weeks of nursing, and agitated for fear of what this unexpected call might portend. Yet to his thought she appeared calm, her manner restrained. Nor could anything be kinder than her first greeting, the frankly extended hand, the words expressive of welcome.

"Mr. Wynkoop informed me a few minutes ago that you had at last received your orders for the north," she said, her lips slightly trembling. "I wondered if you would leave without a word of farewell."

He bowed low. "I do not understand how you could doubt, for I have shown my deep interest in you even from the first. If I have lately seemed to avoid you, it has only been because I believed you wished it so."

There was an embarrassing pause, as though neither knew how to get through the interview.

"No doubt you are rejoiced to be sent on active service again," she said, at last.

"Yes, both as a soldier and as a man, Miss Naida. I am glad to get into the field again with my regiment, to do my duty under the flag, and I am equally rejoiced to have something occur which will tend to divert my thoughts. I had not intended to say anything of this kind, but now that I am with you I simply cannot restrain the words. This past month has been, I believe, the hardest I have ever been compelled to live through. You simply mystify me so that I alternately hope and despair. Your methods are cruel."

"Mine?" and she gazed at him with parted lips. "Lieut. Brant, what can you mean? What is it I have done?"

"It may have been only play to you and so easily forgotten," he went on, bitterly. "But that is a dangerous game, very certain to hurt some one. Miss Naida, your face, your eyes, even your lips almost continually tell me one thing; your words another. I know not which to trust. I never meet you except to go away baffled and bewildered."

"You wish to know the truth?"

"Ay, and for all time! Are you false or true? Coquette or woman? Do you simply play with hearts for idle amusement or is there some true purpose ruling your actions?"

She looked directly at him, her hands clasped, her breath almost sobbing between the parted lips. At first she could not speak. "Oh, you hurt me so," she faltered at last. "I did not suppose you could ever think that. I—I did not mean it; oh, truly I did not mean it! You forget how young I am; how very little I know of the world and its ways. Perhaps I have not even realized how deeply in earnest you were, have deceived myself into believing you were merely amusing yourself with me. Why, indeed, should I think otherwise?"

"I love you," he said, with simple honesty. "I seek you for my wife."

She started at these frankly spoken words, her hands partially concealing her face, her form trembling. "Oh, I wish you hadn't said that! It is not because I doubt you any longer; not that I fail to appreciate all you offer me. But it is so hard to appear ungrateful, to give nothing in return for so vast a gift."

"Then it is true that you do not love me?"

The blood flamed suddenly up into her face, but there was no lowering of the eyes, no shrinking back. She was too honest to play the coward before him.

"I shall not attempt to deceive you," she said, with a slow impressiveness instantly carrying conviction. "This has already progressed so far that I now owe you complete frankness. Donald Brant, now and always, living or dead, married or single, wherever life may take us, I shall love you."

Their eyes were meeting, but she held up her hand to restrain him from the one step forward.

"No, no; I have confessed the truth; I have opened freely to you the great secret of my heart. With it you must be content to leave me. There is nothing more that I can give you, absolutely nothing. I can never be your wife; I hope, for your sake and mine, that we never meet again."

Brant stood like a statue, his face grown white. He did not in the least doubt her full meaning of renunciation.

"You will, at least, tell me why?" It was all that would come to his dry lips.

She sank back upon the sofa as though the strength had suddenly deserted her body, her eyes shaded by an uplifted hand.

"I cannot tell you. I have no words, no courage. You will learn some day from others, and be thankful that I loved you well enough to resist temptation. But the reason cannot come to you from my lips."

He leaned forward, half kneeling at her feet, and she permitted him to clasp her hands within both his own. "Tell me, at least, this—is it some one else? Is it Hampton?"

She smiled at him through a mist of tears, a smile the sad sweetness of which he would never forget. "In the sense you mean, no. No living man stands between us, not even Bob Hampton."

"Does he know why this cannot be?"

"He does know, but I doubt if he will ever reveal his knowledge; certainly not to you. He has not told me all, even in the hour when he thought himself dying. I am convinced of that. It is not because he dislikes you, Lieut. Brant, but because he knew his partial revealment of the truth was a duty he owed us both."

"You leave me so completely in the dark," he said; "is there no possibility that this mysterious obstacle can ever be removed?"

"None. It is beyond earthly power—there lies between us the shadow of a dead man."

He stared at her as if doubting her sanity.

"A dead man! Not Gillis?"

"No, it is not Gillis. I have told you this much so that you might comprehend how impossible it is for us to change our fate. It is irrevocably fixed. Please do not question me any more. I cannot bear it!"

Brant rose to his feet and stood looking down upon her bowed head, her slender figure shaken by sobs.

"Naida, as you have asked it, I will go; but I go better, stronger, because I have heard your lips say you love me. I am going now, my sweetheart, but if I live I shall come again. I know nothing of what you mean about a dead man being between us, but I shall know when I come back, for, dead or alive, no man shall remain between me and the girl I love."

"This—this is different," she sobbed, "different; it is beyond your power."

"I shall never believe so until I have faced it for myself, nor will I even say good-by, for, under God, I am coming back to you."

He turned slowly and walked away. As his hand touched the latch of the door he paused and looked longingly back.

"Naida."

She glanced up at him.

"You kissed me once; will you again?"

She rose silently and crossed over to him, her hands held out, her eyes uplifted to his own. Neither spoke as he drew her gently to him and their lips met.

"Say it once more, sweetheart?"

"Donald, I love you."

A moment they stood thus face to face, reading the great lesson of eternity within the depths of each other's eyes. Then slowly, gently, she released herself from the clasp of his strong arms.

"You believe in me now? You do not go away blaming me?" she questioned, with quivering lips.

"There is no blame, for you are doing what you think right. But I am coming back, Naida, little woman; coming back to love and you."

An hour later N troop trotted across the rude bridge and circled the bluff on its way toward the wide plains.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Mr. Hampton Resolves.

Mr. Bob Hampton stood in the bright sunshine on the steps of the hotel, his appreciative gaze wandering up the long, dusty, unoccupied street, and finallly rising to the sweet face of the young girl who occupied the step above. As their eyes met both smiled as if they understood each other.

"There is nothing quite equal to feeling well, little girl," he said, genially, patting her hand where it rested on the railing, "and I really believe I am in as fine fettle now as I ever have been. Do you know, I believe I'm perfectly fit to undertake that little detective operation casually mentioned to you a few days ago. It's got to be done, and the sooner I get at it the easier I'll feel. Fact is, I put in a large portion of the night thinking out my plans."

"I wish you would give it up all together, Bob," she said, anxiously. "I shall be so dull and lonely here while you are gone."

"I reckon you will, for a fact, but, Naida, it isn't likely this little affair will require very long, and things are lots happier between us since my late shooting scrape. When fall comes I mean to take you east and put you in some good finishing school. Don't care quite as much about it as you did, do you?"

"Yes, I think I do, Bob." She strove bravely to express enthusiasm. "The trouble is, I am so worried over your going off alone hunting after that man."

He laughed, his eyes searching her face for the truth. "Well, little girl, he won't exactly be the first I've had call to go after. Besides, this is a particular case, and appeals to me in a sort of personal way. If you only knew it, you're about as deeply concerned in the result as I am, and as for me, I can never rest easy again until the matter is over with."

"It's that awful Murphy, isn't it?"

"He's the one I'm starting after first and one sight at his right hand will decide whether he is to be the last as well."

"I never supposed you would seek revenge, like a savage," she remarked, quietly. "You never used to be that way."

"Good Lord, Naida, do you think I'm low down enough to go out hunting that poor cuss merely to get even with him for trying to stick me with a knife? Why, there are 20 others who have done as much, and we have been the best of friends afterwards. Oh, no, lassie, it means more than that, and harks back many a long year. I told you I saw a mark on his hand I would never forget—but I saw that mark first 15 years ago. This is a duty I owe a friend, a dead friend, to run to earth this murderer. Do you understand now? The fellow who did that shooting up at Bethune 15 years ago had the same sort of a mark on his right hand as this one who killed Slavin. That's why I'm after him and when I catch up he'll either squeal or die."

"But how do you know?"

"I never told you the whole story and I don't mean to now until I come back and can make everything perfectly clear. It wouldn't do you any good the way things stand now, and would only make you uneasy. But if you do any praying over it, my girl, pray good and hard that I may discover some means for making that fellow squeal."

She made no response but stood gazing thoughtfully past him.

"Have you heard anything lately, Bob, about the Seventh?" she asked finally. "Since—since N troop left here?"

He answered with well-simulated carelessness. "No; but it is most likely they are well into the game by this time. Crook's column, I have just heard, was overwhelmingly attacked on the Rosebud, and forced to fall back. That leaves the Seventh to take the brunt of it, and there is going to be hell up north presently, or I've forgotten all I ever knew about Indians. But come, little girl, as I said, I'm quite likely to be off before night, provided I am fortunate enough to strike a fresh trail. Under such conditions you won't mind my kissing you out here, will you?"

She held up her lips and he touched them softly with his own. Her eyes were tear-dimmed. "Oh, Bob, I hate so to let you go," she sobbed, clinging to him. "No one could have been more to me than you have been, and you are all I have left in the world. Everything I care for goes away from me. Life is so hard, so hard!"

"Donald, I Love You."

"Yes, little girl, I know," and the man stroked her hair tenderly, his own voice faltering. "It's all hard; I learned that sad lesson long ago, but I've tried to make it a little bit easier for you since we first came together. Still, I don't see how I can possibly help this. I've been hunting after that fellow a long while now, a matter of 15 years over a mighty dim trail, and it would be a mortal sin to permit him to get away scot-free. Besides, if this affair only manages to turn out right, I can promise to make you the happiest girl in America. But, Naida, dear, don't cling to me so; it is not at all like you to break down in this fashion," and he gently unclasped her hands, holding her away from him while he continued to gaze hungrily into her troubled face.

"Sometimes I feel just like a coward, Bob. It's the woman of it; yet truly I wish to do whatever you believe to be best. But, Bob, I need you so much, and you will come back, won't you? I shall be so lonely here, for—for you are truly all I have in the world."

With one quick, impulsive motion he pressed her to him, passionately kissing the tears from her lowered lashes, unable longer to conceal the tremor that shook his own voice. "Never, never doubt it, lassie. It will not take me long, and if I live I come straight back."

He watched her slender, white-robed figure as it passed slowly down the deserted street. Once only she paused and waved back to him and he returned instant response, although scarcely realizing the act.

"Poor little lonely girl! Perhaps I ought to have told her the whole infernal story, but I simply haven't got the nerve, the way it reads now. If I can only get it straightened out, it'll be different."

Mechanically he thrust an unlighted cigar between his teeth and descended the steps, to all outward appearance the same reckless, audacious Hampton as of old.

The military telegraph occupied one-half of the small tent next the Miners' Retreat, and the youthful operator instantly recognized his debonair visitor.

"Well, Billy," was Hampton's friendly greeting, "are they keeping you fairly busy with 'wars and rumors of wars' these days?"

"Nuthin' doin' just now," was the cheerful reply. "Everything goin' ter Cheyenne. The injuns are gittin' themselves bottled up in the Big Horn country."

"Oh, that's it? Then maybe you might manage to rush a message through for me to Fort A. Lincoln without discommoding Uncle Sam?" and Hampton placed a coin upon the rough table.

"Sure; write it out."

"Here it is; now get it off early, my lad, and bring the answer to me over at the hotel. There'll be another yellow boy waiting when you come."

The reply arrived some two hours later.

Fort A. Lincoln, June 17, 1876.

Hampton, Glencaid:

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER II.—Hampton offers assistance to the girl, and is at first spurned because he is known as a gambler.

CHAPTER III.—Hampton and the girl only escape from the Indians. They fall exhausted on the plains.

CHAPTER IV.—A company of the Seventh cavalry, Lieut. Brant in command, find Hampton and the girl on the plains, and restore them to consciousness. Hampton announces that he proposes to care for the girl.

CHAPTER V.—Hampton and the girl stop at the Miners' Home in Glencaid, Mrs. Duffy, proprietess. Rev. Howard Wynkoop proposes that Hampton place Miss Gillis in care of Mrs. Herndon. He consents to think it over.

CHAPTER VI.—Hampton talks the future over with Miss Gillis—the Kid. She shows him her mother's picture and tells him what she can of her parentage and life. They decide she shall live with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VII.—The Kid takes up her residence with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VIII.—Naida—the Kid—runs away from Mrs. Herndon's and rejoins Hampton. He induces her to go back, and to have nothing more to do with him.

CHAPTER IX.—Hampton plays his last game of cards. He announces to Red Slavin that he has quit, and then leaves Glencaid.

CHAPTER X.—Miss Phoebe Spencer arrives in Glencaid to teach its first school.

CHAPTER XI.—Miss Spencer meets Naida, Rev. Wynkoop, etc. She boards at Mrs. Herndon's.

CHAPTER XII.—Naida and Lieut. Brant again meet without his knowing who she is. She informs him of the coming Bachelor club ball in honor of Miss Spencer.

CHAPTER XIII.—Lieut. Brant meets Silent Murphy, Custer's scout. He reports trouble brewing among the Sioux.

CHAPTER XIV.—Social difficulties arise at the Bachelor club's ball among the admirers of Miss Spencer. Lieut. Brant meets Miss Spencer but she is not his acquaintance of the day before. She tells him of Naida, and he accidentally meets her again as he is returning to the ballroom with a fan for Miss Spencer.

CHAPTER XV.—He fails to discover her identity.

CHAPTER XVI.—Brant accompanies Naida home from the dance. On the way she informs him as to who she is, and that she is to meet Hampton. Brant meets Hampton with her, and the men make an appointment to meet the following morning.

CHAPTER XVII.—Brant and Hampton meet. Hampton informs the lieutenant that his attentions to Naida must cease, and proclaims an authority over her that justifies the statement. Brant tells Hampton of the presence of Silent Murphy, and the fact that Red Slavin receives government messages for him.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Miss Spencer called on Bob Hampton. Tells him of a red-faced stranger mistaking her for Naida.

CHAPTER XIX.—Hampton interviews Red Slavin. Finds that he is an ex-trooper in the Seventh cavalry. It was Slavin's and Murphy's testimony that more than ten years before had convicted Robert Nolan, then a captain in the Seventh, of the murder of Maj. Brant, Sr. Hampton attempts to force a confession from Slavin. Slavin insists it is Murphy he wants, and Murphy has left. In a scuffle Slavin is killed by a knife thrust.

CHAPTER XX.—Hampton surrenders to Buck Mason, marshal. Mob attempts to capture him. Mason and his prisoner escape to a hill and defend themselves. Mob lights fire to burn them out.

CHAPTER XXI.—Brant tells Naida that he loves her. She tells him there is an insurmountable barrier between them, but that she does not fully understand it.

CHAPTER XXII.—Brant and his troop rescues Hampton and Mason from the fires set by the mob. Brant carries the unconscious gambler through the lines of fire.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Hampton is taken to the hotel and Naida comes to nurse him.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, NOV. 28, 1907.

THE PRESIDENTAL SITUATION.

There are striking resemblances between the Republican situation on the eve of canvass of 1908 and that which presented itself in 1888. Twelve months before the convention met in 1888, Blaine was as strong in his party, as a candidate for the ensuing election, as Roosevelt is now. Nothing except his own peremptory withdrawal could keep the Republicans from nominating him. The withdrawal was not expected. Nevertheless it came, in the latter part of January, 1888, in a letter from Florence, Italy. This threw the Republicans into confusion, but a powerful element of the party kept on working for him. Then Blaine came out with another letter which took him off the track altogether. When Blaine stepped out of the canvass, twenty years ago, a scramble for the candidacy took place which put a larger number of men in the race than has ever appeared in a Republican convention before or since. Nineteen men received votes for the nomination at one time and another during the balloting. It was the longest of all the Republican conventions, lasting six days, and Harrison was nominated. No Republican national convention since then has been particularly exciting. Harrison's renomination in 1892 was foreseen. Several weeks before the convention of 1896 met McKinley's nomination was assured. There was no opposition to McKinleys' renomination in 1906 or to the nomination of Roosevelt in 1901.

If Roosevelt intervenes and prevents the convention from considering him in 1908 we will have the first real contest in a Reoublican gathering which has been seen since 1888. It is possible that in that event the list of aspirants may be nearly as long as it was then, for many favorite sons are being mentioned, while there is no sign of a concentration of many States on one aspirant. It is within the bunds of possibility, therefore, that the convention of 1908 may be memorable for its duration and uncertainity. As the Republican party is far stronger, relatively to the Democracy, than it was twenty years ago, the Republican assemblage of 1908 will attract far more interest than the 1888 gathering commanded.—Leslie's Weekly.

A WORD OF WARNING.

Very recently a movement was started among federal officeholders which does not meet with the President's approval. A meeting was held in Washington, some say at the instigation of a Cabinet official, the purpose of which was to get ready for a stampede for President Roosevelt as his own successor at the next Republican National convention. After the meeting the word was industriously passed by the said office holders that there was "nothing to it but Roosevelt," with the injunction to get into the band wagon. The meeting was held without the President's knowledge or consent and when he heard of it he addressed a letter to the heads of the interior, treasury and postoffice departments, requesting them to inform federal employes under their jurisdiction to refrain from political activity with the object of his renomination. The text of the letter has not been made public but its contents are substantially as follows:

"I am informed that certain officeholders in your department holding various positions throughout the country, contemplate attending Republican conventions in their respective States and urging the endorsement of myself for the presidential nomination. I wish that you would direct federal office holders in your department, who have such a thing in view, that I would regard it as an act of official impropriety and discourtesy."

This will be a severe blow to the boys that are "in" and want to stay there, but the "outs" will rejoice at their handicap. And the boys know that the President means what he says, so there is likely to be a halt in the proceedings.

IN OKLAHOMA.

Three thousand barrels of beer will flow through the gutters of Oklahoma City within the next few days, unless a brewing company gets a special dispensation which will permit it to ship the foamy drink out of the State. The beer is valued at $24,000. In the mean time a large portion of Oklahoma City's population is waiting in thirsty suspense for a final decision. Should the beer flow there will no doubt be many sick citizens the day after. When Oklahoma became a State the prohibition laws went into effect at once. These laws provided that no liquor could be manufactured or sold in the State. The large brewing company [illegible] at once closed its plant, but the stock of 3,000 barrels was on hand. How to dispose of this stock is now the question. If possible, it will be shipped out of the State. Otherwise, the brewers declare that they will pour it into the streets regardless of the result. It is better for them to pour it into the streets than down the throats of the people, so just let them "go it."

THE GROWTH OF METHODISM

Conference Minutes Just Published Show Increase.

The official journal and minutes of the West Virginia conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, held at Huntington, October 9 to 14, and the journal and minutes of the tenth quadrennial session of the lay electoral conference, held at Huntington, Friday, October 11th, has been issued. Rev. Sterling J. Miller, of Wheeling, was the secretary of the church conference at its 61st annual session and Wm. Burdette Mathews of Charleston, was the secretary of the lay electoral conference and the minutes this year show the result of much labor by these two officers. The journal containing the minutes is a book of about 200 pages, and the cover design was drawn by Tom Moore, a Charleston artist. The journal shows that in 1907 the membership of the Methodist Episcopal church in the West Virginia conference totaled 55,533, a net increase of 1,405 over 1906. The total values of church buildings within the conference amounts to $1,703,098, an increase for the year of $196,418. The value of the parsonages is figured at $369,700 an increase in value of $25,333 over 1906. The number of Sunday school members, according to the journal was 53,976 in 1907. It also shows that the funds going toward the support of the ministry amounts to $184,301, which is divided among 250 ministers. These figures show an increase of salary for the pastors amounting to $11,613. During the year $21,192 was contributed by the church benevolence, an increase of $3,007 over the previous year. the total amount contributed to missions to the church was $21,580 an increase of $2,919 over 1906.

The journal contains pictures of lay delegates and also a likeness of Bishop Spillinger who presided at she conference. The lay delegates to the general conference fron the West Virginia conference have been particularly strong and distinguished men. The delegates are, in the order of their death, as follows: Dr. T. H. Logan, prominent citizen and druggist, died in 1889; Chester D. Hubbard, member of congress, died in 1891; Benjamin F. Martin, member of congress, died in 1895; Arthur I. Boreman, governor, U. S. senator and judge, died in 1896; Waitman T. Willey, U. S. senator, died in 1896; A. L. Wade, educational author, died in 1904; Charles F. Scott, Judge, died in 1905, and Asbury J. Clarke, lawyer and capitalist, died in 1907. Dr. Logan and Messrs. Hubbard and Clarke resided in Wheeling; Governor Boreman and Scott in Parkersburg; Senator Willey and Prof. Wade in Morgantown and Mr. Martin in Grafton. The lay conference held October 11, last, paid fitting tribute to their christian characters and worth as men of God, whose influence for good will extend far into the future in the great commonwealth which honored them, and which in turn they also honored.

BITTINGER.

Winter seems to have begun in real earnest this week, as there is a six inch snow upon the ground and sleds are seen upon the roads for the first time this season.

Ashford Warnick, of the Backwoods settlement, was seen in this village last Monday morning.

Frederick Otto, of New Germany, was here early this week buying up Thanksgiving turkeys.

Miss Nora Broadwater, of New Germany, was visiting here last Saturday and Sunday.

Miss Fannie Wiley, who has spent the past two months at her home here, returned to Waterloo, Iowa, last week, where she will resume her duties as professional nurse.

'Squire Wade H. Lohr, of Swanton, passed through here last week.

Mrs. K. A. Bittiuger is preparing to repair her residence in this village this fall.

J. L. Beachy has secured employment at Listonburg, Pa., and will move his family to that place this week.

F. M. Bittinger had his leg slightly injured last Monday while at work in the coal mine.

When Patterson Engle went out to his barn on last Monday evening to feed his stock, he discovered that two raccoons had come in from the woods and taken shelter in the barn, and after locating the animals he called his "little yaller dog" had the satisfaction of seeing a grand fight. The dog was too much for the coons, which were young ones, and they were soon killed.

Men.

The Fort Cobb (Okla.) Record fathers this story about a bright little school girl's composition on men: "Men are what women marry. They drink and smoke and swear and have so many pockets, but they won't go to church. Perhaps if they wore bonnets they would. They are more logical than women and always more zoological. Both men and women have sprung from monkeys, but the women certainly sprung further than the men."

GOOSEBONE TELLS OF COLD WEATHER

According to the Goosebone, There Is a Hard Winter Ahead.

Notwithstanding the fact that Elias Hartz, veteran goosebone prognosticator, is no more, there remain in Reading and vicinity several of his ardent followers, who stand ready to take up his work where he left off. They are warm supporters of the goosebone theory and say prognostications of Hartz always come true.

Hartz foretold weather conditions for many years. He was taught to read goosebones when a boy and made annual predictions for over half a century. Many Reading persons waited for his annual advice. "Fill the coal bins." Others have been following the goosebone and its teachings for many years and are anxious to take up the work.

The earliest prediction of the present year is made by Amos Mayer, a farmer living in the western end of the county. The front part of the top of the center is white for a considerable distance. Beyond this it is dotted, and then comes a long dark streak. The goosebone prophet said to-day.

"According to the breast bone we will have vuite cold weather in the latter part of October and for two weeks in November. Then there will be a warm spell, lasting for a few days. December will be a cold month, with an occasional snowstorm. January will be a month of snow, hail and an occasional cold spell.

The dark color on the end of the breast bone indicates that February will be a very cold month, and there will be several blizzards. At one particular part of the bone it is almost black, which means that we shall have lots of snow and sleet. The cold weather will continue into March, and we will have a very late spring.

The goosebone was compared with several obtained from other birds killed within the past few weeks, and they seem to be marked identically the same.

Trolley Extension.

When The Star suggested, a couple of weeks ago, that the P. & M. trolley line should be extended to Oakland, we struck a very popular chord, and the idea is being very favorably commented on by many people of practical business ideas. Far-seeing men in Grantsville, Salisbury and Meyersdale have complimented The Star on its excellent suggestion, and all are enthusiastically in favor of the Oakland extension, declaring that it would without doubt be a far better paying proposition than an extension to Frostburg.

"Squire" Daniel Dorsey, of Grantsville, was in Salisbury, several days ago, and he said while here that the people of Garrett county, Md., stand ready to encourage the Oakland extension in every possible way.—Salisbury Star.

Wreck Experience Unbalanced Mind

Railroad men state that Fireman John Gerlick, who was on the runaway train on Cranberry grade when Engineer Fallon was killed, is a mental wreck, and it is feared that he will never recover. Gerlick, when told by the engineer that the train was beyond control and that there was likely to be an awful accident, climbed out of the cab and got on top of the boiler, grasping the bell frame.

It was by the greatest effort that he remained in this insecure position, and when the collision occurred and the engine went over the bank into the creek, Gerlick was thrown many feet into a field. He was stunned and dazed for some time and when found he had a portion of the bell frame in his hand. He has since been totally unbalanced by the shock of his terrible experience.

A very valuable draft horse, the property of Mr. F. O. Glotfelty, of Oakland, died on Friday night last of spasmodic colic. The animal was one of four owned by Mr. Glotfelty, he having recently refused an offer of more than a thousand dollars for the team.

Mr. Chas. Davis, of the firm of J. M. Davis & Co., hardware dealers, Oakland, Md., was in the city a portion of Saturday and yesterday, looking after some dusiness matters and visiting Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Schroeder, on West Washington street.—Grafton Republican.

The papers of the large cities are all right if you want them, but it is your own home paper that advertises your churches, your numerous societies, sympathizes with you in your afflictions and rejoices with you in your prosperity. Mrs. Henry Lauer, who visited her old home in the Fatherland for several weeks past, returned to Oakland last Friday evening, having landed in Baltimore from Bremen, Germany, that morning. She was accompanied to Germany by her little son William, both of whom returned to Oakland in good health and spirits. In Baltimore Mrs. Lauer was met by her husband, he having gone to that city the day previous to her arrival.

How quickly can you tell a live town from a dead one by simply looking over its newspaper. A poor skim milk sort of a newspaper with a few small advertisements, and those looking as though they were run at half price, betokens a dead town just as sure as a corpse indicates a funeral, while a good, lively, well-printed newspaper, filled with good, fresh ads, and displayed locals, shows that the town is prospering and thriving. It never fails.

ROADS ARE EXTREMELY BAD.

Farmers Are Complaining of The Condition of Highways.

There were quite a large number of farmers and other folks from different sections of the county in town yesterday, all of them, or at least the majority, bringing large loads of produce, including turkeys, and they stated that the roads leading to town are in a wretched condition, made so by the fall of snow last Saturday night and Sunday and the rains which had occurred previous to the snowfall.

In some places, so it it stated, the roads are almost impassable, large and deep ruts having been cut into the highways by the heavy hauling over them during the past week or two.

Should a cold wave strike us now and freeze the roads in their present rough condition it would make them extremely hard for teams to draw a wagon over.

DID INDIAN SUMMER GO BY UNNOTICED?

It Must Be Gone, Yet No One Caught a Glimpse Of It.

The melancholy days, "the saddest of the year," have arrived certainly. The first real article in the line having put in its appearance late on Saturday, and if the rest of them are as melancholy as it was, they will to say the least, be abundantly and overwhelmingly melancholy. The usual crowds that collect at the intersection of the streets for the past month, were thinner than usual on Saturday and by evening they had all disappeared. Everybody except the regular churchgoers, kept indoors on Sunday and read the papers. Those who went to church in the morning waded in melting snow to get there and back to their homes.

But how about Indian Summer?

Some folks say there hasn't been any seen about this neck o' the woods; some say that it's long passed and gone, and other assert that it was last week. Certainly there hasn't been the usual amount of fine weather, October being much more gloomy than is her wont. When it comes to deciding about Indian Summer, there is always some dispute as to what this season is and when it comes. Webster says "Indian Summer in North America, is a period of warm weather late in the autumn, usually characterized by a clear sky, and by a hazy or smoky appearance of the atmosphere, especially near the horizon."

From this definition it appears that those contending that last week was Indian Summer are right. And at that the only symptoms observable were a pretty clear sky and the hazy atmosphere. Usually Indian Summer furnishes a favorite theme for the Spring poet, but so far, there haven't been many contributions from this source. This is the only one received worth while:

Indian Summer's went,
If it, indeed, has came——
And we must buy an overcoat,
Which is a blasted shame!

Will you please allow space in your valuable paper for a few items from Friendsville.

A delightful reception was given Rev. A. S. Wolf and family, our new pastor, on their arrival at the place on Thursday evening. About forty-five members and friends of the church visited the parsonage and showed their good will by leaving a good supply of the necessaries of life. Brother Wolf is starting well and every indication is for a good year. The congregation has increased from a small number to a well filled house

When he came to the charge at Friendsville he found no choir and no Epworth or Junior League, now we have the best choir the have had for a long time and the Epworth and Junior Leagues have been reorganized and are starting well.

Making Good

By Epes W. Sargent.

Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.

Timidly Elda opened the door and slipped into the little low ceilinged room that she had come to know so well. Sometimes when the agent was busy she would have to wait for half an hour or so, and the photographs of entertainers with which the walls were covered had come to seem like old friends. Most of all, she liked to stand in front of a framed check for $3,000 that had been paid a prima donna of note for singing only three songs at a society function. It was evidence that the business of entertaining others did sometimes pay.

But there was no time for looking at the pictures today. No one stood by the agent's desk, and she looked over expecting the inevitable nod and the curt: "Nothing doing today. Sorry!" that had rewarded her pilgrimages.

"IT'S YOUR TURN NEXT," HE SAID.

Her heart beat faster as the agent swung briskly around in his chair.

"I thought you would be in, so I did not write," he greeted. "I have a chance for you. It is not very much, but it will lead to better things if you make good. The Bow Lake Boat club wants some one to give a few recitations at an entertainment." He caught up a pad of paper and passed it to her after he had made a few marks. She glanced at the white surface and saw "$15." Carmontelle never spoke figures. He always wrote them.

"I shall be glad of anything," said Elda gratefully. "It is very good of you. When is it to be?"

"Thursday night. You go out on the 2:10 train. Bryum, enter Miss Testra for the Bow Lake. Come in Thursday morning for the ticket," he added as the clerk made the entry. "You pay your own fare. It will be $3.40."

He turned back to his desk with a nod of dismissal, and Elda went down the steps as though the worn boards were the softest clouds. The dreary wait was over, and her chance had come just as the little fund which represented all that was left of her father's estate was dwindling to nothingness. With her fare and the agent's commission deducted there was not very much left, but still it was a beginning, and the beginning was what she needed.

She spent the three day interval in selecting her repertory. Before her father's death following his bankruptcy she had been considered clever as an elocutionist and imitator. Now that she sought to earn her living by her single talent she planned with the utmost care.

It was a long, hot ride to Bow Lake. She could not afford a seat in the chair car, and the little package of sandwiches was but a poor substitute for a warm dinner in the dining car.

Her reception at Bow Lake was still more discouraging. A carriage had been sent for her, but at the clubhouse she sat alone for an hour before the steward showed her where to dress, and there was another dismal wait before she was summoned to the stage. The tiny space back of the curtain was crowded with men and women in evening dress. Some of them she remembered having met a few years before when she had come north on a visit, but they only stared at her blankly. They were not looking for acquaintances in paid entertainers, and no one spoke to her until the stage manager came rushing up.

"It's your turn next," he said. "We only want a couple of little bits, you know. We have so much of our own talent."

He was off again, and Elda took her place in the entrance to await the completion of the song. Then the stage manager gave her a slight shove, and she walked out upon the tiny stage. She had appeared in public scores of times and had never felt the slightest degree of nervousness, but now her whole frame shook, and it seemed for a moment as though she would fall. Then the sea of faces became a blur, and she was no longer afraid of them.

After her second selection the thunder of applause told of the success she had scored, and, faint and trembling, but very happy, she sank down into a seat in a dark corner.

No one seemed to notice her, and she missed the little attentions that had always been paid to her. She knew that she had no right to expect them now; she was a professional entertainer, but none the less it hurt.

They were passing refreshments to the others, and the sight of the food made her faint. The room seemed suddenly to blur and then grow dark.

When she opened her eyes again she was in another room—a comfortable looking room—and Nell Bradford, an old school friend, was looking down into her face with pitying eyes.

"You are all right now," she said as Elda scanned the face with puzzled glance. "You fainted back there on the stage, and we brought you here, where we could look after you better. It is one of the small parlors."

"It was the excitement," explained Elda. "You see, it was my professional debut, and it meant so much to me."

Nell stroked the thin, trembling hand. "Why didn't you come to us?" she demanded. "We have been back for three months, and we have been looking everywhere for you. Dick nearly fell off his chair when you came on the stage."

"I did write," explained Elda, "but there was no answer, and so many others dropped me that I"—

"We were in Egypt," explained Nell. "There was some trouble with a certain contract, and Dick went to look after it himself and took me with him. We never dreamed of what was happening."

"It's all right now," said Elda, with a faint smile. "I have 'made good,' as Mr. Carmontelle would say, and my future is assured."

Nell smiled at the suggestion, and the arrival of a tray with coffee and salad brought the conversation to a halt. Afterward those who had not recognized Elsa Beverly in Elda Testra, the entertainer, crowded in to congratulate her upon her success, and Nell Bradford had hard work to keep her big brother from driving them out again.

But Dick Bradford sat beside Elsa in the automobile that was carrying them to the summer cottage they had taken for the season, and Elsa smiled at the masterful way in which he planned for her future.

"I'm going to town tomorrow," he said, "and I shall have your trunk brought out. You are going to stay here until you get rested up, and then, if you'll have me, dear, there will be an entertainment at the boat club to celebrate our wedding."

"Are you sure that you really want me?" she asked timidly. "It's not just because you're sorry for me?"

"Pity!" he echoed, and Nell, sitting in the tonneau, heard and laughed.

"He's been like a bear ever since he found that you were gone," she explained. "Don't talk about pity to his sister, who has suffered from his moods the last three months. For my sake, Elsa, say 'Yes,' and put me out of my misery."

"For Dick's sake," Elsa whispered contentedly as her hand slipped into his for an instant. "Mr. Carmontelle said that if I made good I might get other engagements, but I did not suppose that they would be for life."

Standard Time.

Primarily for the convenience of the railroad a standard of time was established by mutual agreement in 1883, by which trains are run and local time regulated. According to this system the United States extending from 65 degrees to 125 degrees west longitude is divided into four time sections, each of 15 degrees of longitude, exactly equivalent to one hour. The first (eastern) section includes all territory between the Atlantic coast and an irregular line drawn from Detroit to Charleston, S. C., the latter being its most southern point. The second (central) section includes all the territory between the last named line and an irregular line from Bismarck, N. D., to the mouth of the Rio Grande. The third (mountain) section includes all territory between the last named line and nearly the western borders of Idaho, Utah and Arizona. The fourth (Pacific) section covers the rest of the country to the Pacific coast. Standard time is uniform inside each of these sections, and the time of each section differs from that next to it by exactly one hour. Thus at 12 o'clock noon in New York city (eastern time) the time at Chicago (central time) is 11 o'clock a. m.

Leprosy.

That leprosy is a contagious disease is unanimously admitted by the best authorities, but the exact manner of its contagion is certainly difficult to understand. There are many examples of persons living for years in the most intimate family relations with lepers and remaining uninfected. And often but one member of the family will acquire the disease. On the other hand, the history of the disease in different parts of the world shows that it never originates spontaneously, but that its origin can always be traced to human importation. There are also a very large number of recorded cases where leprosy has resulted from a single contact of an abraded surface with some lesion or secretion of an infected individual. These apparently contradictory facts must be explained on the theory that some peculiar inherent predisposition, which exists only in a limited number of individuals, is necessary for the development of this strange disease. There is no reason to believe that leprosy is a hereditary disease.—Exchange.

Temperance Notes

A NEW ORGANIZATION.

Youth's Temperance Alliance of America and What It Will Do.

A new organization, of which Rev. Dr. Alexander Alison is the head, is being organized among the children. It will be known as "The Youth's Temperance Alliance of America." Its effort will be chiefly among the children of the Sabbath schools. It is now being developed under the charter of the National Temperance society, which has been widely known in the temperance world for 52 years in its numerous publications and its aggressive campaigning in the interests of total abstinence. Membership in the Sabbath school will constitute membership in the alliance. Pledge-taking will, however, be kept to the front. Every time the alliance meets, an appeal will be made for those who are willing to sign the pledge, to do so. A book will be kept, and a report made every month, and a full report once a year, of the number thus pledging. The alliance will be organized with a president and vice presidents, the latter being the pastors of the churches and the Sabbath school superintendents. There will be two secretaries, a corresponding secretary and a recording secretary, one treasurer, and the usual committees, as the official heads of the work.

Dr. Alison is widely known in the Presbyterian church for his evangelistic labors of recent years and for his former pastoral service in Philadelphia and Seattle. He takes up this new work in the forty-third year of the existence of the National Temperance society.

ALCOHOL AND BRAIN POWER.

One Cannot Do Best Work Under Narcotic Influence.

The students of the Total Abstinence union in Sweden recently made special inquiry from well known artists and literary men for their views concerning the influence of alcohol for the inspiration of ideas. The answers were decisive and to the point. Auguste Rodin, the great sculptor, replied: "Those who depend on the use of alcohol to give them inspirations or suggestions are doomed to see themselves and their work soon forgotten." Bjornstjerne Bjornson remarked: "When I am engaged in literary work I never use alcoholic liquors, they would only hinder me. The ideas or fancies produced by alcoholic inspiration are not healthy or probable, and are useless for my works." Gustav Trenssen says: "Even a thimbleful of spirits weakens all my best faculties." The Swedish painter, George Van Rosen, concludes by saying: "Very far from believing that the use of alcohol helps to produce artistic ideas or conceptions, I am of the contrary opinion, and believe they will only be hysterical and monstrous, and in most cases they will lead to a weakening and finally to a break up of all inspiring efforts."

A Temperance State.

Mississippi has 75 counties, all but nine of which are under prohibition law. These nine counties lie entirely on the western Mississippi river border and on its narrow southern seaboard. A larger proportion of its area is under prohibition than of any other state in the union except those that rejoice in total extinction of the saloon. It is expected that two more counties will come over to the prohibition side, and men are already predicting that the day is in sight on which the Mississippi saloon shall be driven out.

An Exposition Without Liquor.

In tendering its campus of 355 acres for the purpose of the Pan-Pacific exposition, to be held in Seattle, Wash., during 1909, the University of Washington included a condition to the effect that no liquors may be sold within two miles of these state university grounds. The agreement has been reached, and the grounds are leased by the board under the condition stated.

Weary of Saloon Domination.

Senator Carmack of Tennessee said some time ago: "I am weary of saloon domination. I am weary of the saloon's open alliance with vice, its open contempt of law. I am weary of a condition of things where the man whose business it is to make the laws must hold his office by consent of the man whose business it is to break the laws."

A British Statesman's Word.

A tavern throughout the centuries has been the ante-chamber to the workhouse, the chapel-of-ease to the asylum, the recruiting station to the hospital, the rendezvous of the gambler, the gathering ground for the jail. —Rt. Hon. J. Burns, M. P.

Temperance Continues in Texas.

There are 161 temperance counties in the state of Texas. An active movement is now on foot for local option in the 30 counties now under license law.

To Be Rid of Saloons.

Jackson, Tenn., is to be free from saloons on April 1, 1908. The city's charter will be abolished and it will be reincorporated and placed under the provisions of the Pendleton bill.

Bill and Jim.

I rickellect one Autumn day
When them two kids cum, up our way!
Both mothers knew no sich a son
Hed happened since th' world begun.
Jim scowled a lot, but Bill wuz gay
And sorter chuckled in his play.
They grew t' manhood, hale and strong—
Bill seen th' good, but Jim, th' wrong!

Bill allus seemed t' sort o' sing
His way along through everything;
While Jim he fussed and fumed a lot
An' swore th' world hed gone t' pot.
In doin' bizness, Bill allowed
He'd sorter trust th' common crowd.
Th' thing looked different t' Jim—
He knew they all wuz gougein' him!

As time went on folks tuk t' Bill,
Fer meetin' him wuz sure t' fill
Th' whole blamed day chuck full o' cheer—
Come weal, come woe, Bill didn't keer!
But Jim kept gittin' crosser still—
T' meet him give yer heart a chill,
And when his wife dropped off o' cough,
We reckoned she wuz better off!

Today 'Our Bill' is candydate
Fur guvner of this great ol' state!
They ain't no question he will win,
Becus he'll laf his way right in!
Poor Jim—he's crabbeder than sin—
I allus dodge him when I kin.
Th' moral to this tale's in sight:
They's gist one life—let's live it right!

Slivers of Thought.

I never could figure out how a man or woman could want to die badly enough to take carbolic acid.

It is said that one cannot serve God and Mammon—and yet, when the preacher has pronounced the man and woman one, he frequently leaves all the better part of the service to his wife while he gives Mammon the hardest run he ever had for his money.

I am afraid automobiles will be out of style before I learn the names of their internals.

Just Beyond the Red Barn.

A Wisconsin editor says the state of matrimony is one of the United States. It is bounded by kissing and hugging on one side and cradles and babies on the other. Its chief products are population, broom sticks and staying out at night. It was discovered by Adam and Eve while trying to find a Northwest passage out of Paradise. The climate is sultry until you pass the tropics of house keeping, when squally weather commonly sets in with such power as to keep all hands as cool as cucumbers. For the principal roads leading to this interesting state, consult the first pair of blue eyes you see.

Advice.

That peculiar imitation of a newspaper dubbed by its owners and editors the Rose Hill Times, commonly called the Weakly Squirt, emits a feist-like bark at the Journal. It pretends to presume that we knew in advance what the outcome of the recent investigation at the Athens Hospital would be. If the Times editors are mad as a result of the report of the investigation referred to, they should hasten to Athens, scale the walls of the big hospital building and bite it in the belfry, if it has one.—Hinckley (Miss.) THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

CHURCHES ON WHEELS.

How the Gospel Is Carried to Rural Districts in England.

For some years England has seen a strange "fleet" of "churches on wheels," or gospel wagons, 70 or 80 in number. They go out into the highways and by-ways of the country, reaching populations which otherwise would be neglected spiritually, having neither church, chapel nor Sunday school.

The fleet is manned by 180 hard-working evangelists, some of them excellent instrumentalists; men of tact in dealing with all sorts and conditions of people, says The World To-day. Each wagon carries a collecting box in the form of a tiny facsimile of itself. A generous supply of religious and healthy secular literature is taken on board, and last year the rolling churches sold more than $25,000 worth of it.

Each of these remarkable gospel wagons costs $105, and the first of them appeared nearly ten years ago among the fruit and hop pickers of southern England. In summer time they are not backward in appearing on crowded seaside beaches, and even on race courses, where they attract much attention among a class of people who certainly never enter an ordinary church or chapel.

TRAILED BY INDIANS.

The Story of One of Bishop Hare's Silver Crosses.

Bishop Hare, of the diocese of South Dakota, was sent west many years ago as a missionary bishop of the Episcopal church. He founded the mission at the Rosebud Indian agency, and it was his custom, says Youth's Companion, to give to each Indian that he confirmed a silver cross of a peculiar pattern.

A few years ago a lady from New York was visiting in South Dakota, and the bishop gave her one of these crosses.

Some years after that there was a general convention of the Episcopal church held in New York city, and several Indians were sent as delegates, all wearing Bishop Hare's crosses.

Arriving in New York, they were dazed, and at a loss to know how to find the building where the convention was to be held. But stoically they started out upon the street. Soon after they met a lady, whom they immediately began to follow. Whenever she turned, wherever she went, they went, too. The lady became much annoyed and finally thoroughly frightened to find that wherever she went a line of red men was trailing behind her.

But investigation explained it. She wore their cross, and they, seeing it, had believed her one of their number who would surely go to the meeting they wished to attend; so they had taken her for their guide.

In Japan and China.

Missionary work is often like a heavy freight train. It starts hard and for a time moves slowly, but when once under headway is hard to stop. Both China and Japan are now beginning to show the results of the Christian work which has been done there, says Youth's Companion. It is 100 years since Robert Morrison, a young Scotchman, landed in Canton. He was the first Protestant missionary to China, and his work has so grown that it is proposed to mark the centenary year by the erection of a $100,000 Young Men's Christian association building in Peking. The public lectures given by the Christian churches are attended by the families of the highest officials, and "the sisters of princes, the wives and daughters of dukes" have established ten schools for girls in Peking. From Japan comes word that the Japanese Missionary society now feels itself strong enough to take upon itself the support of 30 native churches which have hitherto been aided by the American board.

What It Costs.

What is the cost of sending this $5,807,165 to the mission fields? The cost of collection and administration of foreign mission funds last year was as follows: United Presbyterian, 4 1-3 per cent; M. E. (north), 5 2-5 per cent; M. E. (south), 5 7-10 per cent; Baptist (north), 11 1-2 per cent; Baptist (south), 6 1-10 per cent; Presbyterian (north) 6 2-10 per cent; Presbyterian (south), 7 1-10 per cent; Reformed church, 8 7-10 per cent; American Board, 10 3-5 per cent; Protestant Episcopal, 11 1-10 per cent.

Headquarters Moved to Chicago.

The International Sunday School association has established headquarters on the eighth floor of the Hartford building, Chicago, Ill., and Mr. Marion Lawrance, the general secretary, has moved from his home in Toledo, O., to that city. Heretofore the main office has been in Boston, Mass. The head of the new department of Bible class promotion is Mr. W. C. Pearce, who has been national superintendent of the teacher training work.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneezing stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Preventics may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child. If there is feverishness, night or day, Hereih probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 45 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Peace Spirit Must Permeate Educational System

By DR. ERNST RICHARD,
Columbia University.

OUR entire education up to this time is based on the old view that the virtues of the warrior are the most important qualities of the patriot, that the safety and the welfare of the nation are dependent on the warlike qualifications of her citizens.

This character of our education is easily explained by the insecure condition of internationals relations, which makes peace appear only as a temporary interruption of war and makes provision for the army and navy the principal object of national economics.

The education in the new spirit must naturally begin with those who set the standards of our educational ideals either as teachers, writers or artists. There seems to be above all an urgent need to form a higher conception of peace itself. We are used to look upon peace only in its negative sense, as absence of war, as freedom from disturbance, while in reality it is the nurse of culture and civilization, the great comprehensive power which brings the nations closer to each other. Those human activities which we call the "Arts of Peace" are not only instruments of human progress, but also furnish the impulses which by innumerable entwining threads create the solidarity of nations we see approach in this 20th century.

From this conception of peace it will be clear that the branch which will be the principal bearer of the systematic education for international solidarity will be history. But not the kind of history now taught almost exclusively usually called "political" history, the history of the new school must treat of war as one of the many elements in human evolution, but not as the most important one; it will not neglect political history entirely, but will assign it to its proper place in the total of human interests.

The principal emphasis of the new history study will be placed on the forces and persons that have built up human civilization, to the events, institutions, ideals that have caused progress. By following these forces to the present day, it will show them at their work of welding the nations together. It will show to the student how much other nations have done toward bringing us to the advanced conditions of today. He will learn that his own nation is only one of the cog-wheels which must work one into the other in the great machinery of the world organization.

The great, the all-important, yet undoubtedly very difficult problem whose solution includes all the rest is the implanting of the peace spirit, the spirit of justice and solidarity in our education and its agencies. Unless this fundamental change in considering human affairs can be brought about, an education for peace in its broadest productive sense is not possible. The traditions of the past emanating from a war-filled atmosphere can lose their dangerous influence only by an interpretation firmly settled on the new internationalism.

The Proper School Age

By PROF. A. E. DOLBEAR,
Professor Emeritus, Tufts College.

As growth proceeds from fundamental to accessory, so the older and stable organs, the large and coarse muscles, are ready for function before those used for nice discriminating movements, and hence children should not have nice, fine, accurate work given to them—needle work, fine writing or drawing. These in the organism come much later.

A teacher in writing once told me that scholars of 15 or 16 years of age would learn more of his art than in all the preceding years devoted to it. He was much chagrined with his lack of success with younger pupils, but it had not occurred to him that the machine was not ready for that art until the later date.

The tests for fatigue have taught us a great lesson—that the lesson period is almost always too long. Forty-five minutes is an extreme limit, and results are better when only half an hour is given. The school day is too long. In Worcester it was proved that with half a day school the scholars got along as fast as when two sessions were required. The period from 11 till 12 is the worst period of the day for school effort.

The old notion that one study could be substituted for another, which had wearied a scholar, is no longer maintained. The period of adolescence is to the very young much as the change from caterpillar to butterfly. Now characteristics, physical and mental, appear suddenly and need care and patience in the teacher, and especially pressure for school work should be very gentle.

At birth a baby has no teeth. Then come the so-called milk teeth; after that a temporary set, which, after a time, fall out, and are replaced one at a time. There are gaps in the dentition. The full set is not complete until the age of 20. There is a somwhat similar condition in mind growth. It is not continuous, and some elementary qualities are displaced by other growths. To require one, with his temporary set, or with the incomplete mature set, to do faithful and persistent chewing on such food as is provided, in order that his teeth, or faculties, may be properly developed, is physiological nonsense. But when the same notion is applied in education, what shall be said?

The whole tendency of child study is to warn us against so much study. Instead of beginning school work at the age of five or six, as we do now, Dr. Hall suggests it might be better to turn all children out to grass till they are a dozen years old.

The eyesight of scholars is being ruined early, so that spectacles have to be worn before school days are over, because so great demand is made for conning print every day that the muscles of the eye cannot recover their ability to focus for long distances. If present school requirements are kept up half the population of the next generation will have to wear spectacles all the time. The average scholar cannot before 16 safely stand more than two or three hours of book work per day without endangering his eyes.

To attempt to force the work before the organism is ready is wicked. Effort then is absolutely wasted, and punishment or even pressure for failure is as brutal as it would be to punish a paralytic for not walking. That almost all kinds of school work are begun too early is apparent from the slow progress made, no matter what means are adopted to help. Work in all grades is quite over the heads of scholars, and no cure can be effected by change of methods in teaching the material demanded now.

Hester Ann's Thanksgiving

By FRANK H. SWEET.

[Copyright, 1907, by Frank H. Sweet.]

"THERE, so much done!" said Aunt Kate Evans, slamming the oven door. "Hester Ann, haven't you finished those potatoes yet? I never saw such a slow child! And look at all you've wasted by your careless paring! Give me the knife!"

Hester Ann meekly surrendered the knife and stood watching her aunt as the thin brown parings slipped through the quick fingers. She wished Aunt Kate didn't work so fast—it seemed as if it would be easier to speak to her if she did not, and there was something she wanted so much.

"Aunt Kate," she said shyly.

"Well?"

"Are we going to have any Thanksgiving?"

The last potato dropped into the pan of cold water with a splash, and Aunt Kate turned her handsome gray eyes on her niece.

"I'd like to know what put such nonsense as that in your head," she said. "As if I didn't have enough to do taking care of a great growing girl like you without getting up any fancy dinner! Perhaps you'd like turkey and mince pie?" she added sarcastically.

"Yes'm, I would."

Aunt Kate almost gasped at Hester Ann's audacity. She sat down in one of the wooden chairs and looked severely at the child.

"Hester Ann, look here," she said.

"Yes'm," answered Hester Ann humbly. There was a sorrowful curve to the childish mouth and the big brown eyes were full of tears as she raised them obediently to her aunt's face.

"Haven't I taken good care of you these two years?"

"Yes'm."

"Haven't you always had good whole clothes and plenty to eat?"

Hester Ann looked down at the queer old fashioned green dress that reached below her shoe tops. "Yes'm," she repeated.

"Then I'd like to know what call you have to be teasing for anything more. We'll have our regular boiled dinner next Thursday, just as usual, and, now mind, I don't want to hear another word of this nonsense. Now you can go and sweep off the front steps and the walk."

Hester Ann went to the shed for the old brown and then out to the front walk. She shivered in the chilling wind as she worked. The whole world seemed very cold and desolate.

The next morning the sun shone brightly, and Hester Ann in her brown merino walked to church beside her aunt.

After church was over Aunt Kate went home, but Hester Ann stayed at Sunday school. As she slipped shyly into her place in the class the girls nodded to her good naturedly and went on with their talk. They liked Hester Ann in a way, but they could not understand her. The quiet little figure in the queer old fashioned dress might almost have been a visitor from some other world, so little had they in common with her. Hester Ann was used to this. She settled back in her corner and watched admiringly the pretty girlish faces. She noticed the way the sunlight seemed tangled in Flossie Arnold's fluffy golden hair and how pretty Jessie Benton's dark eyes and glowing cheeks looked in contrast to her crimson dress. Hester Ann could never have curly golden hair, but when she was rich she was going to have a dress like Jessie Benton's—a warm dark red, like a June rose in the sunlight. The girls were chattering about Thanksgiving. "Oysters and turkey and every kind of pie and ice cream and fruits!" exclaimed one.

"Oh, we're going to have a real old time party in the evening and roast apples and popcorn and make candy. Of course we have a big dinner—everybody does," said Jessie.

Suddenly Flossie turned to Hester Ann. "What are you going to have Thanksgiving?" she asked.

Hester Ann's face grew rosy red. Her lips trembled and then set themselves in a firm line. She was so long in answering that the girls all stopped talking and looked at her curiously.

"A boiled dinner," she said at last quietly.

"A boiled dinner," repeated Flossie in a puzzled tone. "What is that? I don't believe we ever had one. What—Oh, here comes Miss Alice! Hester Ann says she's going to have a boiled dinner Thanksgiving day. Isn't that funny? Did you ever eat one?"

Miss Alice understood at once. She put her hand lovingly on Hester Ann as she answered Flossie: "I shall never forget a boiled dinner I once ate when I was a little girl. It seemed to me I had never tasted anything so delicious.

"But Thanksgiving means a great deal more than dinner, you know, girls. I wish you would make out a list of the things you have to be thankful for and give it to me Thanksgiving morning at church. You may think there are so many things you want that there isn't much on the other side, but if you are honest you will be surprised at the result. Write both sides if you want to. I should like to see which is my most thankful girl."

After dinner Hester Ann studied the lesson for the next Sunday. Then she found a bit of pencil and piece of brown paper and began to write her list. Aunt Kate looked suspiciously at her once or twice, but asked no questions. It was 5 o'clock when Hester Ann began. At 6 her aunt called her to supper. She laid the paper and pencil carefully aside and ate her bowl of bread and milk and two molasses cookies. She washed the dishes and then went back to her paper, but it was too dark to see.

"Can't you light the lamp a little earlier tonight?" she asked timidly.

"You can't read until the usual time, Hester Ann," answered her aunt. "If I can't see to work it's dark I guess you can't read."

Aunt Kate hurriedly began work on a pumpkin pie.

Hester Ann walked very soberly through the gate and down the street. She could not understand it at all; but, anyway, Aunt Kate was not cross and she would see Miss Alice—two things to be glad about.

Two hours later she came slowly up the road and closed the gate behind her. She did not feel glad or thankful just then. Every step made her rebel more against the boiled dinner. Slowly she opened the door and went into the house. Aunt Kate, with a fresh white apron over her best dress, was just placing a crisply browned turkey on the table. Hester Ann stood in the doorway, her color changing from red to white and her eyes round with amazement.

"Why, Aunt Kate," she gasped, "is the minister coming?"

"The minister! I guess it's likely he'd leave home today, don't you? No; it's only for you and me, and everything's ready, so run up and take off your things. You'll find new hair ribbons on the bureau."

Hester Ann nursed upstairs, trembling with a strange delight. Two soft crimson ribbons lay on the bureau. She smoothed them lovingly. How many many beautiful things were suggested! She would remember Thanksgiving day all her life. She put on the new ribbons and the crimson made her was also glad of the other because she could watch the gleam of the ribbons as she looked down—She

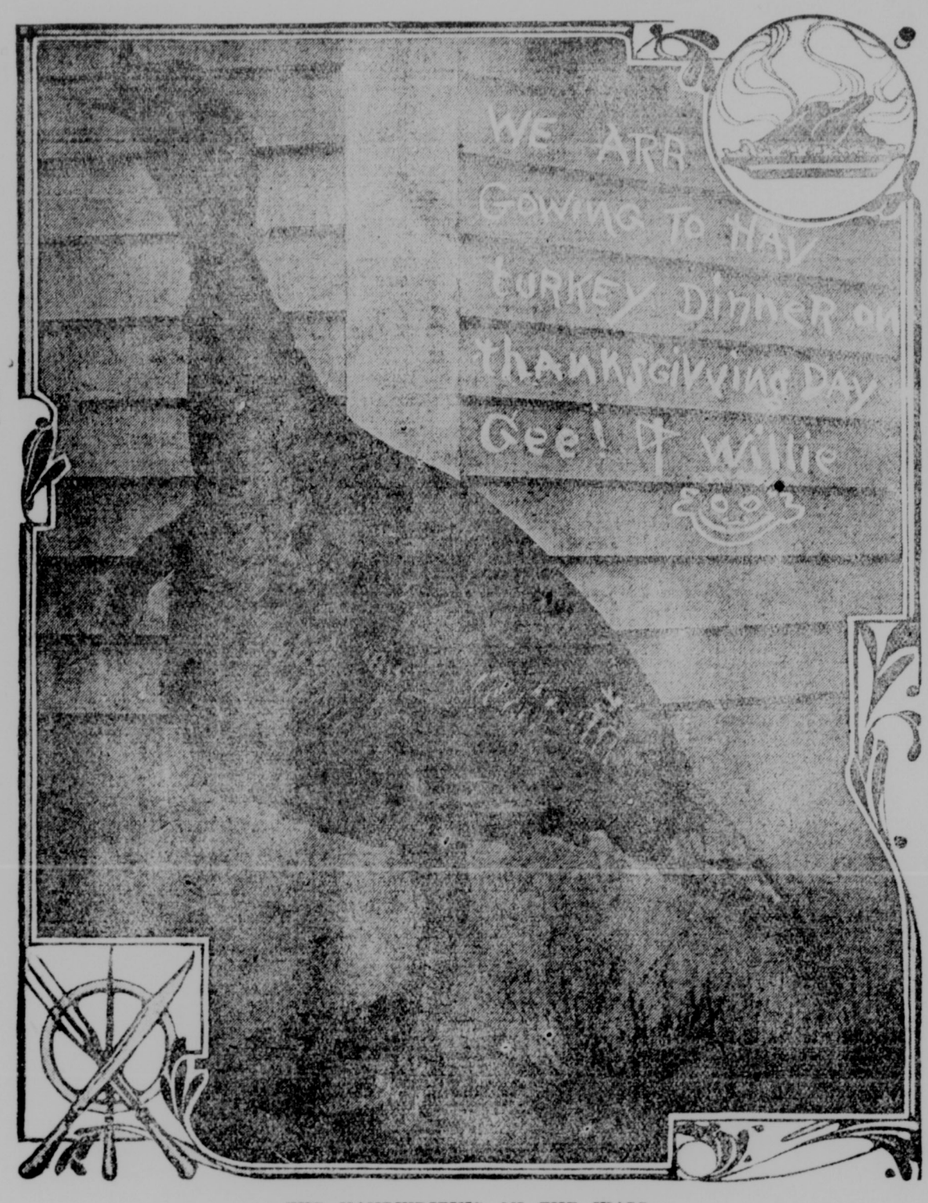
Ann jumped from her seat threw her arms around her aunt's "Oh, Aunt Kate, I always did," said, "only you were so handsome so—so tall—and I was always fearing. If you will only let me you good night, as mamma did."

Aunt Kate stroked the smooth brown head awkwardly. "I wish you would," she said. Hester Ann slipped down and picked up the kitten.

"I think we're such a beautiful family," she said contentedly. "I didn't know Thanksgiving could be so nice, Aunt Kate."

His Excellency the Turkey.

As early as 1541 the turkey was classed among the dainties in England. The wild turkey of North America has been used mainly as the foundation from which size and vigor in our domestic stock have been gained. The bronze holds the post of honor and probably originated from a cross between the wild and the tame turkey. Its beautiful plumage and size come from its wild progenitor. To maintain these desirable qualities crosses are occasionally made. The standard weight is from sixteen to thirty-six pounds, according to age and sex. In point of production the bronze exceeds all others. The coloring is a ground of black blazoned or shaded with bronze. This shading is rich and glowing, and when the sun's rays are reflected from these colors they shine like polished steel. While the female has the same color, it is not so rich as that of the male. Much of this richness of color is lost through inbreeding. On the other hand, it is improved by each cross with the wild birds.



THE HANDWRITING ON THE WALL.

The Mother of Thanksgiving

By ROBERTUS LOVE.

[Copyright, 1907, by Robertus Love.]

IT is an interesting fact that the person who immortalized the little lamb also immolated the big gobbler. The author of "Mary's Little Lamb" was the originator of the American Thanksgiving day as annually observed. It is pleasant to know that it was a woman who won these two distinctions, either of which is sufficient to carry her name to immortal renown. That name in full was Sarah Josepha Buell Hale. Her literary work was published under the name of Sarah J. Hale. Born in 1788 at Newport, N. H., she was about six months old at the time of the first inauguration of Washington as first president of the United States. From the English poets which she read assiduously, the young girl acquired her love for literature. She was married in 1813 to David Hale, a lawyer, and in 1822 Mrs. Hale was left a widow with five small children. The young widow was perhaps the first woman in the United States to support herself and family by her pen.

SARAH J. HALE, MOTHER OF THANKSGIVING.

In 1828 she removed to Boston, where she became editor of the Ladies' Magazine, then recently established. She held this post for nine years. Then the publication was consolidated with Godey's Lady's Book at Philadelphia, and Mrs. Hale became editor of that celebrated periodical, holding the position continuously for forty years. Thus on the two magazines her editorial career extended over forty-nine years. She retired in 1877, being then eighty-nine years of age. She died in Philadelphia April 30, 1879.

The Woman's Aid society, originated in Boston by Mrs. Hale, is the parent of many similar organizations in various ports. As an editorial writer Mrs. Hale always advocated the advancement of women. She urged their employment as teachers and the establishment for them of higher seminaries of learning. She also started a movement which resulted in the training of many women for medical missionary service in foreign lands. While editor of the Ladies' Magazine in Boston Mrs. Hale proposed that the women of New England should raise $50,000 to complete the Bunker Hill monument. This proposition was carried out, the women holding a great fair for the purpose. Mrs. Hale took a leading part in the management of the fair. Thus the Bunker Hill monument stands today in a certain sense as a monument to Mrs. Sarah J. Hale.

But it is with her efforts in behalf of a national Thanksgiving day that we are chiefly concerned here. About the time that Mrs. Hale began agitating the raising of the monument fund she also suggested that Thanksgiving should be made a national festival, to be held each year on the same day throughout the country. Prior to that time New England had held Thanksgiving days, but these were usually of a very serious and somber sort, calculated to depress rather than to cheer. In the main they were days of humiliation and fasting. Mrs. Hale proposed a festival involving thanks to Almighty God for blessings rendered.

Mrs. Hale went about her work in earnest. For more than twenty years she urged the idea, through her Boston magazine first and later through the Philadelphia publication. She opened personal correspondence on the subject with the governors of various states and with each succeeding president of the United States.

There was an interval of forty-six years, from 1815 to 1861, during which no president of the United States issued a proclamation either for humiliation and prayer or for thanksgiving and praise. In New England the ancient custom was kept up by proclamations from the state governors. President Lincoln, acting upon a recommendation from a joint committee of both houses of congress proclaimed the last Thursday in September, 1861, "as a day of humiliation, fasting and prayer in an effort to restore peace." Other similar proclamations were issued by Lincoln during the civil war, and by 1864 the last Thursday in November had come to be regarded as the proper Thanksgiving day.

With the close of the war and the restoration of peace Thanksgiving became a day of rejoicing rather than of humiliation, and thus at last Mrs. Hale's suggestion, which was altogether in accord with the cheerful spirit of the present age, was crystallized into one of our most popular and useful national institutions.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1907. NUMBER 40

POLITICAL NEWS OF MARYLAND.

No Friction Over Delegates to The Republican National Convention.

BALTIMORE, Md., Dec. 2.—The approaching meeting of the republican national committee in Washington next week has started gossip over the candidate to be favored by the Maryland delegation to the next national convention. Collector William F. Stone, the local leader, who is sergeant-at-arms of the national committee, will leave here next Wednesday for the Capital city. When asked whom he regarded as the favorite for the presidential nomination, and who in his judgment should be nominated, Collector Stone begged to be excused from discussing that matter. It is generally known, however, that Mr. Stone is intensely loyal to the national administration and will be governed entirely by its wishes. Regarding the policy of the party leaders in this state, the collector was more communicative. "I do not apprehsnd any friction whatever when the time arrives to make nominations," he said today. "The party leaders in every section of the state should get together and thus insure unanimity of action. It seems to me that there should be no difficulty in the state convention in arriving at selections for delegates at large and alternates who will be entirely satisfactory to the party as a whole.

"I take it for granted," continued Collector Stone, "that Representatives Mudd, Pearre and Jackson, State Chairman Parran and National Committeeman Stevenson A. Williams and the various county leaders are deeply interested in the work of the convention and that they are willing and ready to get together, just as they did in selecting our republican gubernatorial candidates last August, so as to present a harmonious front. So far as the district delegates are concerned they are chosen by the several congressional districts in conventions entirely independent of each other. The primary election law has been so amended by the legislature as to permit the holding of primaries for the selection of delegates to these conventions under the auspices of the party organizations, and our party constitution was so amended that 'unit rule' would prevail in several districts of the state. Hence each district may choose such delegate to the national convention as it may deem proper, and in my judgment these delegates will be in good accord with the national administration."

The democrats, on the other hand, are all at sea over the national situation in their party. One thing, however, is assured, and that is that there will not be a Bryan delegation selected. Those in control of the party machinery now do not take kindly to the silver-tongued orator from Nebraska—in fact absolutely refused support on the two occasions when Bryan was the party candidate. During the stay of Mr. Bryan in this city last Sunday not a single organization leader of prominence called upon him. Representative Talbott, who is the national committeeman from Maryland, returned this week from a visit to National Chairman Taggart in Indiana, where a number of other national committeemen also visited Mr. Taggart. When asked by a press correspondent if there was any great sentiment for Bryan in 1908 among the committeemen, Mr. Talbott replied: "Quite a number of the national committeemen hold the view that the nomination of Bryan would be inexpedient at this time. The impression, however, seemed to be general that if Bryan wanted the nomination he could get it, but there was a division of sentiment as to whether he really wanted it." Mr. Talbott declined to discuss the man who would be favored by the Maryland delegation, saying that the date for the convention was too far off.

One of the knotty problems that will confront the party leaders when the democratic legislature meets are the demands to be made by the Anti-Saloon League and the local option advocates regarding Baltimore city. The political leaders of influence are opposed to such a thing as ward or precinct local option, and legislation along such lines will not be passed if they can prevent it. The city leaders have a plan in mind which includes the holding of a special election to decide whether local option shall prevail all over the city. Those who favor such a plan assert that no part of the city has the right to escape its responsibilty for the existence of the saloon at the expense of any other part. It is, therefore, right, they claim, that the voters of the city should settle the local option question as one community —and they do not believe that the whole people will turn down the saloons. By adopting this plan the politicans say they can escape the responsibility, as the people will be free to decide for themselves.

Great impetus was given the local option movement during the week by Mayor Mahool, who declared in favor of it. This was a jar to the local democratic leders, but they got a more positive jit when Mayor Mahool went squarely on record in favor of the merit system in the conduct of municipal affairs. The mayor at the meeting of the electrial commission this week flatly refused to sanction the wholesale dismissal of employes simply because they happened to be republicans and the battle will be fought out at the next meeting. The two other members of the commision are City Register Thomas and President Parrish of the fire board, who will dominate the commission when the vote is taken. Report has it that Thomas and Parrish will refuse to vote for the reappointment of the general foreman, and a locking of horn with the mayor is confidently expected. The leaders and ward heelers are watching the fight with great interest, for the outcome will decide whether the spoils or merit system is to prevail.

Unavoidable delays, due principally to bad weather, have caused another postponement of the opening of the Washington, Baltimore and Annapolis electric railway scheduled for tomorrow. It is now stated that the road cannot be ready for operation before January 1 next and possibly a month later. Practically all of the work in Baltimore has been finished excepting the stringing of wires. The executive offices of the company were moved this week from the Maryland Trust building to the new terminal station at Marion street, Park avenue and Liberty street. The offices take up the entire second floor of the building, while on the first floor there is a large waiting room for passengers, a ticket office and three stores one on Park avenue and two on Liberty street, in addition to space occupied by tracks. In the basement there are toilet rooms and the baggage department. Cars will enter the station from Liberty street and leave by way of Park avenue. The equipment of the company will consist of nineteen passenger coaches, costing $20,000 each; four combination baggage and passenger cars, costing $16,000 each, and two freight express cars, costing $12,000 each. Eight of the coaches have been delivered and are now at the company's shops at Academy Junction.

HENRY G. DAVIS TO BE MARRIED.

Woman of 35 to Become Bride of Well Known Millionaire.

Former United States Senator Henry Gassaway Davis, of West Virginia, 84 years old, multi-millionaire and Democratic candidate for Vice President in the last campaign, is to be married, his intimate friends assert.

The bride-to-be, according to the announcement, is Miss Maud Ashford, daughter of the late Mahlon Ashford, poor in her own right and only a few months ago earning her living by working as a society reporter for a Washington newspaper. Through her marriage she will come into vast wealth, as Senator Davis has a fortune of $30,000,000.

The same friends say the wedding bells will ring out before the new year dawns and that with the marriage of their father Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, wife of Senator Elkins, of West Virginia, and Mrs. Arthur Lee will be cut off from millions. Miss Ashford is a close friend of Mrs. Lee.

Miss Ashford is perhaps 35 years old and has a charming personality, a musical voice and great self-poise.

Attractive Thanksgiving Observances in the U. B. Church of Swanton.

Thursday, November 28th, 1907, the day designated by proclamation of the President of the United States, the governor of the several States and ecclesiastical functionaries of the country at large, as the day set apart from the common pursuits of man as a day of praise and thank offerings was a typical one in Swanton. While hills and peaks were white in their winter robes with breezes stiff and biting, all was warm, bright and glowing within the walls of the Swanton United Brethern church where a goodly congregation had gathered at an early hour for previously announced unification of worship designed to embrace the various shades of religioug thought extant in the community.

Proceedings were opened with, and the sermon and addresses were interspersed by, excellent music appropriate to the services and rendered by the choir of the congregation.

Rev. J. E. Johnson, who has supplied the chancel for more than nine successive years and has won a enviable place in the popular esteem, opened the ceremonies in brief but timely chosen preliminary remark sgivingan rapid review of the civil and religious origin of Thangsgiving customs, and stated that the sermon would be delivered by the Rev. Oliver Stoneking of Terra Alta, W. Va., and that following the sermon a temperance pledge, to exist only from date to the first Monday in January next—covering the holiday season—would be read and explained. Mr. Stoneking preached an animated sermon harmonizing with the National and State call upon the people to the place of appointed prayer and praise.

At the close of this discourse the announced temperance feature was presented by C. M. Miller and thirty subscribed to the pledge binding until the 6th day of January, 1908.

Probably the more pleasing part of the evening's services and entertainments was reserved for the end when Mr. Johnson, the pastor, was made the recipient of many useful gifts and donations brought by worshippers present, and the glad and generous spirit of the doners happily relieved them from the taint on tinge found in the declaration of the beautiful Ophelia:

"Rich gifts wax poor when the givers prove unkind." RELLIM.

WRECK AT B. & O. STATION.

Many Railroad Men Had to Miss Their Thanksgiving Dinner In Consequence.

About eight o'clock last Thursday morning—Thanksgiving Day—a wreck occurred at the railroad station in Oakland, which delayed eastbound traffic several hours and impeded to a great extent trains westward bound, besides disappointing many railroad men who had planned to eat Thanksgiving dinner with their families either at Cumberland or Grafton.

The wreck was caused by a brake rigging under a coal car dropping down and striking upon the hotel crossing, which derailed the car and uncoupling it from the front of the train at the same time. Before its momentum was checked it plowed into the platform adjoining the track on the south side, tearing it to pieces for a distance of about fifty feet. In addition to wrecking the boardwalk the track was badly damaged and twisted out of shape. The track damage, however, was soon repaired by Foreman Morrison and his force of men. To replace the derailed car the steam crane from Keyser was called into service.

Thanksgiving Service in M. E. Church at Swanton.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Never has Swanton had a more interesting and successful Thanksgiving service than that held in the Methodist Episcopal church on Thursday night, Nov. 28th. The church which is very pretty in its architectural style and finish, was nicely decorated for the occasion, the arrangement of the decorations showing that some master hand had been at work. Among other things that attracted attention was this, in large letters, nicely arranged, "O, give thanks to the Lord, for He is good."

The flowers for the occasion were furnished by Mrs. S. M. Fairall.

Although the roads were in a very bad condition, making driving very unpleasant, yet the church, which is the largest in the district, was well filled by as an attentive and appreciative audience as ever assembled in Swanton.

The song service was in charge of Prof. J. F. Groves assisted by his class and the Loch Lynn Male Quartette. At 7 p. m., the organist, Miss Percie George, began to play "America," and "My Country, 'tis of Thee" was sung as never before in this place. This was followed in rapid succession by one appropriate song after after another by the choir and the Loch Lynn Male Quartette, all being well rendered. The singing of the Swanton class proved that they had been well trained by Prof. Groves, while the Quartette in singing their fine selections so well, made a most favorable impression.

At 8 p. m. the Rev. J. B. Workman, of St. Paul's M. E. church, Oakland, began a Thanksgiving sermon, from the text "Blessed is that Nation whose God is the Lord," 33 Psalm, 12 verse.

The song service had well repaid every one present for their trip through the mud, but for nearly one hour Rev. Workman gave us one of the best Thanksgiving Sermons it has ever been our privilege to hear. The audience gave close attention to the eloquent words as the speaker called attention in a masterly way to some of the many things for which we as a people and a nation should give thanks to Almighty God. Surely God hath not dealt so with any Nation.

At the close of this eloquent and very appropriate sermon our postmaster, Mr. W. W. Sweet, in a very apt and interesting address, called attention to the fact that the pastor, Rev. Albert Engle, was to be ponnded then and there. The pastor seemed to take the matter good naturedly and replied in a way that he had not been hurt very badly by the "pounding" he had received, and by his kind and appreciative remarks in reply one would almost have supposed that he could "stand it some more." The "pounding" amounted to $14 19 in cash and a large box of groceries. The service then closed by singing "Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow," and from the manner in which it was sung it seemed that each one present was grateful for this happy and very successful Thanksgiving service.

The Accident school will render a choice literary programme December 20th, 1907, 7.30 p. m. They say the programme is to be one of unusual merit. Aside from the excellent work prepared by the school, there will be some very fine music furnished by the Rev. Zimmerman. He will have his fine piano down and render choice selections. Miss Martha Mintz will render some well adapted solos. Then too you are to be entertained by some hightoned male quartette music given by the Accident Glee Club. There will be a small admission fee looking to the purchase of a library for the school. All are invited ty attend and help along in the good work.

SECRETARY.

A Wrong Version.

A wrong version of the difficulty between officers of the Maryland Sunday School Association and myself has been circulated in many parts of the state. This fact compels me to do the unpleasant thing of publishing a true version that the real facts may be known. I ask my friends to await my statement on oath before they form an opinion. It is an awful arraignment of men professing to be religious leaders, and it saddens me to send it out, but I feel that I am justified in doing so.

A Rural Reading Circle.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

A teachers' meeting will be held at the Red House school, District No. 8, Friday evening, Dec. 6, to discuss methods in meeting and overcoming difficulties in teaching English.

Friends of education are respectfully invited. This will be the seventh meeting of the little circle organized in Cherry Creek school house, Sept. 27, to act in full accordance with the Garrett County Teachers' Association, and to take up the studies assigned by the State Reading Circle.

The study of historical subjects occupied part of the time but recently discussion of method has been taken up and many helpful ideas have been exchanged.

We believe several such sub-circles could accomplish much good by awakening great interest in the public schools of our county.

Newspaper Suspends.

The Georges Creek Press, published at Lonaconing by Mr. C. T. Clayton, suspended publication with its issue of last week. Mr. Clayton will continue in business at Lonaconing. He has been engaged in journalism in Maryland for the past ten years, first embarking at Midland, Allegany county, where he established a newspaper, later removing the plan to Lonaconing.

Public School Holiday.

County Superintendent E. A. Browning requests this paper to announce that for the Holidays the public schools of the county will close on the 20th inst., and will reopen on January 2nd.

ADVISES AGAINST HASTY WEDDINGS.

Judge Dennis, Baltimore, Comments on Causes Leading to Divorces.

Looking back over a long experience on the bench, Judge Upshur Dennis, of Baltimore, has reached the conclusion that the press and pulpit do not pay enough attention to the question of marriage. He believes that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure; that if people were wisely advised before marriage they would not keep the divorce courts so busy afterward.

In his cosy office in the Courthouse Judge Dennis discussed the question of marriage and divorce. "The divorce laws are all right," he said. "There is no necessity for altering them. The trouble about marriage is that so many people go into it without giving it proper consideration. They ought to be advised on the subject by the pulpit and the press. We do not want more divorce laws; we want more common sense advice about matrimony."

"What is the leading cause of divorce, Judge?" he was asked.

"The many imperfections of human nature," he said promptly. "You cannot ascribe the general failings of matrimony to any specific cause. Here's a poor fellow, for instance, who makes a dollar or so a day. He comes home some evening and the dinner isn't just right, and there's a quarrel. The upshot of it is that he clears out and leaves the wife to shift for herself. It makes no difference to him. Perhaps he'll get a job in some other city; any place where he has a job is home to him. Well, his wife ought to be allowed to divorce him and marry some fellow who'll take care of her—that is, if she wants to. As it is, she's neither maid, widow nor wife. The point is that the couple went into the married state headlong, without duly considering the fact that marriage is a bond for life. They hadn't been advised on the subject. If they had they probably wouldn't have been married in the first place. This is where the pulpit ought to come in. Preachers ought to talk more about these questions; so ought the newspapers.

"As a matter of fact the newspapers pay more attention to the exploitation of divorce scandals than they do to advising people about being married. And it does a great deal of harm. Some half-baked intellects see these long accounts of the marital troubles of prominent people, and finally they begin to think that they'll have to get a divorce, too, in order to be in the swim."

"Do you think, Judge, that poverty causes much of the divorce courts business?"

"It is responsible for some. But understand me, I do not mean to say that poor people ought not to be married. I do mean to say that they ought to consider it carefully before taking so serious a step, just as rich people should do."

"As I say," remarked the Judge, "the divorce laws in Maryland are entirely sufficient. We don't want any changes. What we do want is more thought on the subject by the educators of the people."

"Who are the most to blame for divorce—men or women?"

"Lord bless you, that question cannot be answered by any general statement. Humanity isn't perfect; it's full of imperfections, and trouble is bound to come when two people settle down to live the remainder of their natural lives together. It makes no difference which side is to blame. As a matter of fact, I suppose one side is as often at fault as the other. The point is that trouble does come, that much of it ends in the divorce courts, and some of it could certainly be prevented if people were made to realize beforehand the irrevocability of the step—the fact that it isn't a temporal arrangement, but a life contract—and could be made to think seriously before getting into it."

Judge Dennis was moved to make these observations on the subject of matrimony by the fact that he has been busied lately with the hearing of a large number of alimony cases.

LIFE IS ARMED IN THE DESERT

How Animal and Vegetable Life Is Protected.

THE TRIALS OF PROSPECTORS

The Trade Rat and His Nightly Visits The Gila Monster is Seldom Seen A Year in Death Valley—An Unwritten Law Among the Miners.

From the Los Angeles Times.

Almost all life on the desert goes armed. In the vegetation world of the desert the cactus comes first with its numberless species. They are all armed with long or short tough spines that can penetrate the thickest boot. The solitary and often grotesque "Joshua" or Yucca, the mesquite, the catsclaw, and numberless shrubs whose names have not been written, all are armed in one way or another. Some exude poisonous sap, others nauseating odors. The sage brush is about the only one that does not seem to have any protection.

In the animal kingdom most are either armed with sharp teeth, spines, odors, or poison to serve to keep their enemies at a distance, while the others depend upon their fleetness or artful skulking and hiding.

The spiked and repulsive Gila monster, the horned toad, the sidewinder with his two horns and deadly fangs, and its cousin, the desert rattlesnake; the tarantula, scorpion, and desert bee, each of whose sting is exceedingly painful and some times fatal, are among the desert's denizens. There are many varieties of lizards, large and small and of many colors, which protect themselves by their speed alone. The prowling coyote, bobcat, mountain lion, jack-rabbit, cottontail, mountain sheep, ibex, antelope and an occasional deer are there.

Among the smaller animals are the gopher, kangaroo rat, trade rat, hydropeobia skunk, ground squirrel and innumerable mice. But the traveler seldom sees any of these. The prospector, however, becomes acquainted with them. The first, or at the latest, second night of his stay in any one camp, he will be visited by a trade rat, that will carry away all that portion of his outfit that is not too heavy for his ratship to handle and religiously leave some stick or stone in its place.

A hydrophobia skunk will be apt to call and lunch from any bacon rinds that may be lying about, not disdaining a nip at Mr. Prospector's nose if the opportunity offers. It is said and firmly believed by the sons of the desert that the bite of this little skunk produces hydrophobia. The Gila monster is seldom seen, and the writer after having spent nearly a year on the borders of Death Valley has yet to see one of them at large. Rattlesnakes are also scarce, except in some favorable locality.

The mountain sheep and ibex are gradually becoming tame, and this summer they have come to springs where miners were camped as regularly as domestic stock and with little more timidity. The mountain quail follows the miner and his burro. In the Avawatz Mountains they were unknown until this year, but they are abundant there now. It is an unwritten law among the miners on the desert that no game animals or birds shall be killed or in any way disturbed unless one is in actual want, and he must make proof convincing of that fact if he kills a quail or sheep.

All life on the desert lives by its power to resist thirst. All desert plants are so constructed that they are able to conserve and store up moisture against the time of drought. This necessity has wrought peculiar forms of both animals and plants, and in time it also leaves its indelible mark upon men who dwell amid its wastes. The leaves of all desert trees are small and thick, so that they expose as little surface as posible for evaporation in the dry air. The great and ever present evidence of the struggle for water is noticeable everywhere where men come together on the desert. In this struggle all who come to the desert must engage instantly. Every wagon must have its water barrels, every burro his water bags, each man his canteen.

TWO-MILE CONCRETE CAUSEWAY.

Link in The Railway Route to Key West.

Reference has been made previously in this department to an extension of the East Florida Railway to the island of Key West. The line will make use of several of the keys or islets on the southern coast, these serving as stepping stones. They are to be connected with each other by viaducts composed of concrete, spanning shallow depths. As rather heavy storms visit this region at times it has been decided to carry the structure up thirty feet above water level. What is known as the Long Key section, reaching from Long Key to Conch Key, and two miles in length, is now approaching completion. It will probably be finished by next New Year's day. In fact, the concrete work on that span is probably ended already, and the month of December will be devoted to track laying.

According to "The Engineering Record" the structure consists of a series of 180 concrete arches, heavily reinforced with steel rods. The radius is twenty-five feet, making the full span fifty feet from pier to pier and the height above mean low water twenty-five feet. Spandrel walls are built on each side of the arch. Between these walls the space is filled with sand and marl dredged from the vicinity of the viaduct.

The bottom is a coraline rock, incrusted with a surface of harder material, somewhat like that which forms around a geyser. For the most part the bottom was comparatively clean, but in places it was covered for several feet in depth with a deposit of marl and sand. When the crust, which varied in depth from four inches to more than a foot, was broken through softer material was encountered, which, though requiring blasting for its removal, was comparatively easy to penetrate with a drill, or even allowed of driving piling in the ordinary manner.

Three vital steps were taken in constructing the piers between the arches. First a water-tight timber well, or coffee dam, was sunk in the proper place, with the assistance of boats. Then in order to secure a firm anchorage piles were driven inside the coffer dam, portions sticking up. Finally the concrete was filled in. So well was this work done that a heavy storm which interrupted proceedings a year ago left the piers unharmed, though much of the other material and appliances were destroyed. It ought to be added that the coffer dam was not the mould for a pier. A special form was placed inside the dam when it was once in place. Later both the form and coffer dam were removed.

WORK DONE ON PANAMA CANAL.

First Report Submitted by The Commission.

CONTRACT LABOR IS NO GOOD.

Shows an Aggregate Expenditure of Over Forty-eight Millions, Besides The Fifty Millions Paid to France and Panama.

Full details of the work done on the Panama canal during the fiscal year 1907, with a showing of what has been accomplished since the project has been in American hands, are disclosed in the annual report of the Isthmian Canal Commission made public today. It is the first report made of operations on the isthmus since construction work has been in charge of army engineers. Aside from the $50,000, paid to the French company and to Panama, an aggregate of $52,285,110 has been expended by the government on the project adopted by Congress, and which it was estimated by the board of consulting engineers would ultimately cost $139,705,200. This estimate, however, did not include sanitation and expenses of the zone government, waterworks, sewers and paving in Panama and Colon and the re-equipment of the Panama railroad. There is no reference in the report to the proposition which has been brought forward to extend the width of the locks to 110 feet so as to accommodate without difficulty the extreme bredth in the development of shipbuilding, and this will be made the subject of a special commission.

A strong position is taken favorable to a continuation of the policy of doing the work by hire instead of by contract labor, a step at one time seriously considered by the administration, and many arguments are presented to justify the commission in its conclusion that the canal can be built better, cheaper and more quickly by the government. Sanitation, upon which so much depends for the comfort and health of the employes, is treated of in the report, a statement is made of what has been done, and the declaration made that there was no yellow fever originating on the ishmus during the year.

As bearing on the question of the suitability of the foundations for the proposed lock sites, the report quotes from the conclusions of a board of consulting engineers, who made a personal examination of the material at the lock sites and which found that all of the locks of the dimensions then proposed (an 85-foo level canal) would rest on rock of such character that would finish a safe and stable foundation.

The completion of the canal will necessitate the abandonment of the present main line of the Panama railroad, and preliminary surveys for location of a new line on the east side of the canal were commenced the latter part of July and completed in November. The location of the line was practically determined in March, and involves the excavation of 20,000,000 cubic yards of material and the placing of 12,000,000 cubic yards of embankments.

By June 20 branches from the main line had been started at Pedro Miguel, Gatun, Lion Hill, Gamboa, Miraflores, San Pablo and La Boca Junction. A trestle 500 feet in length was driven at Gaton and a dumping trestle was being driven at Pedro Miguel. Three permanent culverts were begun at Pedro Miguel and one at Mindi.

For the accommodation of gold employes 656 quarters, both bachelors and family, were constructed, and for silver employes 335 buildings were erected, consisting of barracks, bathhouses, cooksheds, family quarters and kitchens. For the sanitary department 33 buildings were constructed for hospital purposes.

Of the 2,265 buildings which were received from the French Canal Company 252 were repaired during the year and 113 destroyed. There are 678 of these buildings yet remaining to be repaired, remodeled or demolished.

A total of 767 new new buildings were and on June 30, 1907, there were on constructed covered by this report, had 2,190 buildings of all classes.

CARRIE NATION SCORES ROOSEVELT

She Resents His Taking the M[illegible] From U. S. Coins.

"He's an infidel. That's all I've got to say about him," cried Carrie Nation, she of hatchet fame, when she arrived in Cleveland, O., and had ensconced herself in the Y. M. C. A., a hotel without a bar.

She was referring to President Roosevelt and the omission of "In God We Trust" from the new coins.

"Now, Roosevelt is laughing at the Christians in this country. That's what the infidels do at the Christians work. He is failing to advertise God and do his work when he orders those words off the coins.

"IN GOD WE TRUST."

As a matter of fact, how many of the excellent gentlemen who protest so violently are familiar with the coinage of the United States? It was not until 1864 that the words whose disappearance agitates them first appeared on the two-cent piece, which has long since been with drawn from circulation. In 1866 the motto was first stamped on the eagle. Can any of the clergymen now so bitterly condemning President Roosevelt say offhand, without examining the coins, on which pieces of currency the motto "In God We Trust" is and is not to be found. Is there a single one that knows as an actual fact that it appears on quarters, half-dollars and dollars silver pieces and on all the gold, and does not appear on the one-cent, five-cent and ten-cent pieces. How many practical men in every day life can describe correctly the designs and lettering on one [illegible] all of these coins? Here is a [illegible] ple test as to the effect of the motto upon the daily life of the average person.—N. Y. World.

Weather Talk.

That when we meet together,
And on other things fail to agree,
We all agree on the weather!"

"Morning Jones."
"Morning, Smith."
"Beastly weather!"
"Horrible!"
"Not much like the brisk, bracing kink we had a year ago now!"
"Should say not!"
"Hope it'll change for the better soon."
"Hope so."
Brown meets Smith ten minutes later.
"Hallo, Smith!"
"Hallo, Brown."
"Fine, bracing weather."
"Beats all!"
"Quite different from the nasty, muggy spell we had a year ago."
"Isn't it, though?"
"And it's going to stay with us a while."
"Hope so."
Robinson meets Brown.
"Howdy, Brown?"
"Howdy, Robinson?"
"Funny sort o' weather!"
"Just about to say so."
"Neither one thing nor the other."
"Nope!"

"Exactly the same!"
"No sign of its getting better either."
"Not a bit!"

representation, much loneliness of soul. To run this Murphy to cover remained his final hope for retrieving those dead, dark years. Ay, and there was Naida! Her future, scarcely less than his own, hung trembling in the balance. The sudden flashing of that name into his brain was like an electric shock. He cursed his inactivity. Great God! had he become a child again, to tremble before imagined evil, a mere hobgoblin of the mind? He had already wasted time enough; now he must wring from the lips of that misshapen savage the last vestige of his secret.

He dressed for the road, for hard, exacting service, buckling his loaded cartridge belt outside his rough coat and testing his revolvers with unusual care. He spoke a few parting words of instruction to Mrs. Guffy and went quietly out. Ten minutes later he was in the saddle, galloping down the dusty stage road toward Cheyenne.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The Trail of Silent Murphy.

The young infantryman who had been detailed for the important service of telegraph operator sat in the Cheyenne office, his feet on the rude table, his face buried behind a newspaper.

"Could you inform me where I might find Silent Murphy, a government scout?"

The voice had the unmistakable ring of military authority, and the soldier operator instinctively dropped his feet to the floor.

"Well, my lad, you are not dumb, are you?"

The telegrapher's momentary hesitation vanished; his ambition to become a martyr to the strict laws of service secrecy was not sufficiently strong to cause him to take the doubtful chances of a lie. "He was here, but has gone."

"Where?"

"The devil knows. He rode north, carrying dispatches for Custer."

"When?"

"Oh, three or four hours ago."

Hampton swore softly but fervently, behind his clinched teeth.

"Where is Custer?"

"Don't know exactly. Supposed to be with Terry and Gibbons, somewhere near the mouth of the Powder, although he may have left there by this time, moving down the Yellowstone. Murphy's orders were to intercept his column somewhere between the Rosebud and the Big Horn. No other scout along this border would take such a detail. But that old devil of a Murphy just enjoys such a trip. He started off as happy as ever I see him."

"How far will he have to ride?"

"Oh, 'bout 300 miles as the crow flies, a little west of north, and the better part of the distance, they tell me, it's almighty rough country for night work. But then Murphy, he knows the way all right. Sorry you didn't come along a little earlier," he said, genially. "Do you know Murphy?"

"I'm not quite certain. Did you happen to notice a peculiar black scar on the back of his right hand?"

"Sure; looks like the half of a spear. He said it was powder under the skin."

A new look of reviving determination swept into Hampton's gloomy eyes—beyond doubt this must be his man.

"How many horses did he have??"

"Two."

"Did you overhear him say anything definite about his plans for the trip?"

"What, him? He never talks, that fellow. He can't do nothing but sputter if he tries. But I wrote out his orders, and they give him to the 25th to make the Big Horn. You wasn't planning to strike out after him, was you?"

"I might risk it if I only thought I could overtake him within two days; my business is of some importance."

"Well, stranger, I should reckon you might do that with a dog-gone good outfit. Murphy's sure to take things pretty easy to-day, and he's almost certain to follow the old mining trail as far as the ford over the Belle Fourche, and that's plain enough to travel. Beyond that point the devil only knows where he will go, for then is when his hard ridin' begins."

The moment the operator mentioned that odd scar on Murphy's hand, every vestige of hesitation varnished. Beyond any possibility of doubt he was on the right scent this time. Murphy was riding north upon a mission as desperate as ever man was called upon to perform. The chance of his coming forth alive from that Indian-haunted land was, as the operator truthfully said, barely one out of a hundred. To the end, to the death if need were, he would follow!

The memory of his old plain craft would not permit any neglect of the few necessaries for the trip. He bought without haggling over prices, but insisted on the best. So it was four in the afternoon when he finally struck into the trail leading northward. He rode a mettlesome, half-broken bronco, a wicked-eyed brute, which required to be conquered twice within the first hour of travel; a second and more quiet animal trailed behind at the end of a lariat, bearing the necessary equipment.

He had, by persistent questioning, acquired considerable information, during that busy hour spent in Cheyenne, regarding the untracked regions lying before him, as well as the character and disposition of the man he pursued. Both by instinct and training he was able to comprehend those brief hints that must prove of vast benefit in the pathless wilderness.

The night was already dark, but stars were gleaming brilliantly overhead, and the trail remained easily traceable. It became terribly lonely on that wilderness stretching away for unknown leagues in every direction, yet Hampton scarcely noted this, so watchful was he lest he miss the trail. To his judgment, Murphy would not be likely to ride during the night until after he had crossed the Fourche. There was no reason to suspect that there were any hostile Indians south of that stream, and probably therefore the old scout would endeavor to conserve his own strength and that of his horses, for the more perilous travel beyond.

About midnight, the trail becoming obscure, the rider made camp, confident he must have already gained heavily on the man he pursued. He lariated his horses and flinging himself down on some soft turf, almost immediately dropped asleep. He was up again before daylight, and, after a hasty meal, pressed on. The nature of the country had changed considerably, becoming more broken, the view circumscribed by towering cliffs and deep ravines.

Late in the afternoon he reined up his horse and gazed forward into a broad valley, bounded with precipitous bluffs. The trail led directly down toward where a considerable stream of water shone silvery in the sun, half concealed behind a fringe of willows. And yonder, close in against those distant willows, some black dots were moving. Hampton glued his anxious eyes to the glass. The leveled tubes clearly revealed a man on horseback, leading another horse. The animals were walking. There could be little doubt that this was Silent Murphy.

Hampton lariated his tired horses behind the bluff and returned to the summit, lying flat upon the ground, with the field-glass at his eyes. The distant figures passed slowly forward into the midst of the willows, and for half an hour the patient watcher scanned the surface of the stream beyond, but there was no sign of attempted passage. The sun sank lower and finally disappeared behind those desolate ridges to the westward. Hampton's knowledge of plainscraft rendered Murphy's actions sufficiently clear. This was the Fourche; beyond those waters lay the terrible peril of Indian raiders. Further advance must be made by swift, secret night riding, and never-ceasing vigilance. This was what Murphy had been saving himself and his horses for. Beyond conjecture, he was resting now within the shadows of those willows, studying the opposite shore and making ready for the dash northward. Hampton believed he would linger thus for some time after dark, to see if Indian fires would afford any guidance. Confident of this, he passed back to his horses, rubbed them down with grass, and then ate his lonely supper, not venturing to light a fire, certain that Murphy's eyes were scanning every inch of skyline.

Darkness came rapidly, while Hampton sat planning again the details of his night's work. Then, with the two animals trailing cautiously behind, he felt his slow way on foot down the steep bluff, into the denser blackness of the valley.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The Haunting of a Crime.

Murphy rested on his back in the midst of a thicket of willows, wide awake, yet not quite ready to ford the Fourche and plunge into the dense shadows shrouding the northern shore. Crouched behind a log, he had so far yielded unto temptation as to light his pipe.

Murphy had been amid just such unpleasant environments many times before, and the experience had grown somewhat prosaic. Even Indian-scouting degenerates into a commonplace at last. So Murphy puffed contentedly at his old pipe.

But suddenly there was the faint crackle of a branch to his left, and one hand instantly closed over his pipe bowl, the other grasping the heavy revolver at his hip. There came a plain, undisguised rustling in the grass,—some prowling coyote, probably; then his tense muscles immediately relaxed, and he cursed himself for being so startled, yet he continued to grasp the "45" in his right hand, his eyes alert.

"Murphy!"

That single word, hurled thus unexpectedly out of the black night, startled him more than would a volley of rifles. He sprang half erect, then as swiftly crouched behind a willow, utterly unable to articulate. For the instant his very blood ran cold; he appeared to shrivel up.

"Hampton Glued His Anxious Eyes to the Glass."

"Oh, come, Murphy; speak up, man; I know you're in here."

That terror of the unknown instantly vanished. This was the familiar language of the world, and, however the fellow came to be there, it was assuredly a man who spoke.

"Who—the hell—are ye?" he blurted out.

The visitor laughed, the bushes rustling as he pushed toward the sound of the voice. "It's all right, old boy. Gave ye quite a scare, I reckon."

Murphy could now dimly perceive the other advancing through the intervening willows, and his Colt shot up to the level. "Stop!—ye take another—step an' I'll—let drive. Ye tell me—first—who ye be."

The invader paused, but he realized the nervous finger pressing the trigger and made haste to answer. "It's all right, I tell ye. I'm one o' Terry's scouts."

"Ye are? Jist the same—I've heard—yer voice—afore."

"Likely 'nough. I saw service in the Seventh."

Murphy was still a trifle suspicious. "How'd ye git yere? How'd ye come ter know—whar I wus?"

The man laughed again. "Sorter hurts yer perfessional feelins, don't it, old feller, to be dropped in on in this unceremonious way? But it was dead easy, old man. Ye see I happened thro' Cheyenne only a couple o' hours behind ye, with a bunch o' papers fer the Yellowstone. The trail's plain enough out this far, and I loped 'long at a pretty fair hickory, so thet I was up on the bluff yonder, and saw ye go into camp yere just afore dark. You wus a-keepin' yer eyes skinned across the Fourche, and naturally didn't expect no callers from them hills behind. The rest wus nuthin', an' here I am. It's a darn sight pleasanter ter hev company travelin', ter my notion. Now kin I cum on?"

Murphy reluctantly lowered his Colt, every movement betraying annoyance. "I reckon. But I'd—a damn sight—rather risk it—alone."

The stranger came forward without further hesitation. The night was far too dark to reveal features, but to Murphy's strained vision the newcomer appeared somewhat slender in build, and of good height.

"Whar'd—ye say ye—wus bound?"

"Mouth o' the Powder. We kin ride tergether fer a night or two."

"Ye kin—do as ye—please, but—I ain't a huntin'—no company,—an' I'm a'—goin' 'cross now."

He advanced a few strides toward his horses. Then suddenly he gave vent to a smothered cry, so startling as to cause the stranger to spring hastily after him.

"Oh! My God! Oh! Look there!"

"What is it, man?"

"There! there! The picture! Don't you see?"

"Naw; I don't see nuthin'. Ye ain't gone cracked, hev ye? Whose picture?"

"It's there!—O Lord!—it's there! My God! can't ye see?—An' it's his face—all a-gleamin' with green flames—Holy Mary—an' I ain't seen it—afore in—15 year!"

He seemed suddenly to collapse, and the stranger permitted him to drop limp to the earth.

"Darn if I kin see anythin', old man, but I'll scout 'round thar a bit, jest ter ease yer mind, an' see what I kin skeer up."

He had hardly taken a half dozen steps before Murphy called after him: "Don't—don't go an' leave me—it's not there now—thet's queer!"

The other returned and stood gazing down upon his huddled figure. "You're a fine scout! afeard o' spooks. Do ye take these yere turns often? Fer if ye do, I reckon as how I'd sooner be ridin' alone."

Murphy struggled to his feet and gripped the other's arm. "Never hed nuthin' like it—afore. But—but it was thar—all creepy—an' green—ain't seen thet face—in 15 year!"

"What face?"

"A—a fellow I knew—once. He—he's dead."

The other grunted disdainfully. "Bad luck ter see them sort," he volunteered, solemnly. "Blame glad it warn't me es see it, an' I don't know as I keer much right now 'bout keepin' company with ye fer very long. However, I reckon if either of us calculates on doin' much ridin' ternight, we better stop foolin' with ghosts, an' go ter saddlin' up."

They made rapid work of it, the newcomer proving somewhat loquacious, yet holding his voice to a judicious whisper. It was he who led the way down the bank, the four horses slowly splashing through the shallow water to the northern shore. Before them stretched a broad plain, the surface rocky and uneven, the northern stars obscured by ridges of higher land. Murphy promptly gave his horse the spur, never once glancing behind, while the other imitated his example, holding his animal well in check, being apparently the better mounted.

They rode silently. The way became more broken and rough as they advanced, causing them to exercise greater caution. Flying clouds obscured the stars, yet through the rifts they caught fleeting glimpses sufficient to hold them to their course. And the encroaching hills swept in closer upon either hand, leaving them groping their way between as in a pocket, yet ever advancing north.

Finally they attained to the steep bank of a considerable stream, found the water of sufficient depth to compel swimming, and crept up the opposite shore dripping and miserable, yet with ammunition dry. Murphy stood swearing disjointedly, wiping the blood from a wound in his forehead where the jagged edge of a rock had broken the skin, but suddenly stopped with a quick intake of breath that left him panting. The other man crept toward him, leading his horse.

"What is it now?" he asked, gruffly. "Hev' ye got 'em agin?"

The dazed old scout stared, pointing directly across the other's shoulder, his arm shaking desperately.

"It's thar!—an' it's his face! Oh, God!—I know it—15 years!"

The man glanced backward into the pitch darkness, but without moving his body.

"There's nuthin' out there, 'less it's a firefly," he insisted, in a tone of contempt. "You're plum crazy, Murphy; the night's got on yer nerves. What is it ye think ye see?"

"His face, I tell ye! Don't I know? It's all green and ghastly, with snaky flames playin' about it! But I know; 15 years, an' I ain't fergot."

He sank down feebly—sank until he was on his knees, his head craned forward. The man watching touched the miserable, hunched-up figure compassionately, and it shook beneath his hand, endeavoring to shrink away.

"My God! was thet you? I thought it was him a-reachin' fer me. Here, let me take yer hand. Oh, Lord! An' can't ye see? It's just there beyond them horses—all green, crawlin', devilish—but it's him."

"Who?"

"Brant! Brant—15 year!"

"Brant? Fifteen years? Do you mean Maj. Brant, the one Nolan killed over at Bethune?"

"He—he didn't—"

The old man heaved forward, his head rocking from side to side; then suddenly he toppled over on his face, gasping for breath. His companion caught him and ripped open the heavy flannel shirt. Then he strode savagely across in front of his shrinking horse, tore down the flaring picture, and hastily thrust it into his pocket, the light of the phosphorous with which it had been rubbed being reflected for a moment on his features.

"A dirty, miserable, low-down trick," he muttered. "Poor old devil! Yet I've got to do it for the little girl."

He stumbled back through the darkness, his hat filled with water, and dashed it into Murphy's face. "Come on, Murphy! There's one good thing 'bout spooks; they don't hang 'round fer long at a time. Likely es not this 'un is gone by now. Brace up, man, for you an' I have got ter get out o' here afore mornin'."

Then Murphy grasped his arm and drew himself slowly to his feet.

"Don't see nuthin' now, do ye?"

"No. Where's my—horse?"

The other silently reached him the loose rein, marking as he did so the quick, nervous peering this way and that, the starting at the slightest sound.

"Did ye say, Murphy, as how it wasn't Nolan after all who plugged the major?"

"I'm damned—if I did. Who—else was it?"

"Why, I dunno. Sorter blamed odd though, thet ghost should be a-hauntin' ye. Darn if it ain't creepy 'nough ter make a feller believe most anythin'."

Murphy drew himself up heavily into his saddle. Then all at once he shoved the muzzle of a "45" into the other's face. "Ye say nuther word—'bout thet, an' I'll make—a ghost outer ye—blame lively. Now, ye shet up—if ye ride with me."

They moved forward at a walk and reached a higher level, across which the night wind swept, bearing a touch of cold in its breath as though coming from the snow-capped mountains to the west. There was renewed life in this invigorating air and Murphy spurred forward, his companion pressing steadily after.

When the first signs of returning day appeared in the east, the two left their horses in a narrow canyon, and crept to the summit of a ridge. Below lay the broad valley of the Powder. Then Murphy turned his head, and looked back into the other's face.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The Verge of Confession.

Murphy uttered one sputtering cry of surprise, flinging his hand instinctively to his hip, but attempted no more. Hampton's ready weapon was thrusting its muzzle into the astounded face, and the gray eyes gleaming along the polished barrel held the fellow motionless.

"Hands up! Not a move, Murphy! I have the drop!" The voice was low, but stern, and the old frontiersman obeyed mechanically, although his seamed face was fairly distorted with rage.

"You! Damn you!—I thought I knew—the voice."

"Yes, I am here all right. Rather odd place for us to meet, isn't it? But, you see, you've had the advantage all these years; you knew whom you were running away from, while I was compelled to plod along in the dark. But I've caught up just the same, if it has been a long race."

"What do ye—want me fer?" The look in the face was cunning.

"Hold your hands quiet—higher, you fool! That's it. Now, don't play with me. I honestly didn't know for certain I did want you, Murphy, when I first started out on this trip. I merely suspected that I might, from some things I had been told. When somebody took the liberty of slashing at my back in a poker-room at Glencaid, and drove the knife into Slavin by mistake, I chanced to catch a glimpse of the hand on the hilt, and there was a scar on it. About 15 years before, I was acting as officer of the guard one night at Bethune. It was a bright starlit night, you remember, and just as I turned the corner of the old powder-house there came a sudden flash, a report, a sharp cry. I sprang forward only to fall headlong over a dead body; but in that flash I had seen the hand grasping the revolver, and there was a scar on the back of it, a very peculiar scar. It chanced I had the evening previous slightly quarreled with the officer who was killed; I was the only person known to be near at the time he was shot; certain other circumstantial evidence was dug up, while Slavin and one other—no, it was not you—gave some damaging, manufactured testimony against me. As a result I was held guilty of murder in the second degree, dismissed from the army in disgrace, and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. So, you see, it was not exactly you I have been hunting, Murphy,—it was a scar."

Murphy's face was distorted into a hideous grin.

"I notice you bear exactly that kind of a scar, my man, and you spoke last night as if you had some recollection of the case."

The mocking grin expanded; into the husky voice crept a snarl of defiance, for now Murphy's courage had come back—he was fronting flesh and blood. "Oh, stop preachin'—an' shoot—an' be damned ter ye!"

"You do me a grave injustice, Murphy. Your slashing at me down in Glencaid hasn't left so much as a sting behind. It's completely blotted out, forgotten. I haven't the slightest desire to kill you, man; but I do want to clear my name of the stain of that crime. I want you to tell the whole truth about that night's work at Bethune, and when you have done so, you can go. I'll never lay a finger on you; you can go where you please."

"Bah!—ye ain't got no proof—agin me—'sides, the case is closed—it can't be opened agin—by law."

"You devil! I'd be perfectly justified in killing you," exclaimed Hampton, savagely.

Murphy stared at him stupidly, the cunning of incipient insanity in his eyes. "En' whar—do ye expect—me ter say—all this, pervidin', of course—I wus fule 'nough—ter do it?"

"Hands Up!. Not a Move, Muhpry! I Have the Drop!"

"Up yonder before Custer and the officers of the Seventh, when we get in."

"They'd nab me—likely."

"Now, see here, you say it is impossible for them to touch you, because the case is closed legally. But I've had to suffer for your crime, Murphy, suffer for 15 years, ten of them behind stone walls; and there are others who have suffered with me. It has cost me love, home, all that a man holds dear. The very least you can do in ordinary decency is to speak the truth now. It will not hurt you, but it will lift me out of hell."

"Well—maybe I might. Anyhow, I'll go on—with ye. Kin I sit up? I'm dog tired—lyin' yere."

"Unbuckle your belt, and throw that over first."

"I'm damned—if I will. Not—in no Injun—country."

"I know it's tough," retorted Hampton, with exasperating coolness, his revolver's muzzle held steady; "but, just the same, it's got to be done. I know you far too well to take chances on your gun. So unlimber."

"Oh, I—guess not," and Murphy spat contemptuously. "Do ye think—I'm afeard o' yer—shootin'? Ye don't dare—fer I'm no good ter ye—dead."

"You are perfectly right. You are quite a philosopher in your way. You would be no good to me dead, Murphy, but you might prove fully as valuable maimed. Now I'm playing this game to the limit, and that limit is just about reached. You unlimber before I count ten, you murderer, or I'll spoil both your hands!"

The mocking, sardonic grin deserted Murphy's features.

"Unlimber! It's the last call."

With a snarl the scout unclasped his army belt, dropped it to the ground and sullenly kicked it over toward Hampton. "Now—now—you, you gray-eyed—devil, kin I—sit up?"

The other nodded. He had drawn the fangs of the wolf, and now that he no longer feared, a sudden, unexplainable feeling of sympathy took possession of him. Murphy sputtered and swore, but his victorious companion neither spoke nor moved. There were several distant smokes out to the northward now, evidently the answering signals of different bands of savages, while far away, beneath the shadow of the low bluffs bordering the stream, numerous black, moving dots began to show against the light brown background. Hampton, noticing that Murphy had stopped swearing to gaze, swung forward his field-glasses for a better view.

"They are Indians, right enough," he said, at last. "Here, take a look, Murphy. I could count about 20 in that bunch and they are traveling north."

The older man adjusted the tubes to his eyes and looked long and steadily at the party.

"They seem—to be a-closin' in," he declared, finally, staring around into the other's face, all bravado gone. "There's another lot—bucks, all o' 'em—out west yonder—an' over east a smudge is—just startin'. Looks like—we wus in a pocket—an' thar' might be some—har-raisin' fore long."

"Well, Murphy, you are the older hand at this business. What do you advise doing?"

"Me? Why, push right 'long—while we kin keep under cover. Then—after dark—trust ter bull luck an' make—'nuther dash. It's mostly luck, anyhow."

"You mean we should start now?"

"Better—let the cattle rest—first. An'—if ye ever feed prisoners—I'd like ter eat a bite—mesilf."

They rested there for over two hours, the tired horses contentedly munching the succulent grass of the coulee, their two masters scarcely exchanging a word. Murphy, after satisfying his appetite, rested flat upon his back, one arm flung over his eyes to protect them from the sun.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. Among them is a stranger who introduces himself by the name of Hampton, also Gillis, the post trader, and his daughter. Gillis and a majority of the soldiers are killed during a three days' siege.

CHAPTER VI.—Hampton talks the future over with Miss Gillis—the Kid. She shows him her mother's picture and tells him what she can of her parentage and life. They decide she shall live with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VII.—The Kid takes up her residence with Mrs. Herndon.

CHAPTER VIII.—Naida—the Kid—runs away from Mrs. Herndon's and rejoins Hampton. He induces her to go back, and to have nothing more to do with him.

CHAPTER IX.—Hampton plays his last game of cards. He announces to Red Slavin that he has quit, and then leaves Glencaid.

CHAPTER X.—Miss Phoebe Spencer arrives in Glencaid to teach its first school.

CHAPTER XIII.—Lieut. Brant meets Silent Murphy, Custer's scout. He reports trouble brewing among the Sioux.

CHAPTER XIV.—Social difficulties arise at the Bachelor club's ball among the admirers of Miss Spencer. Lieut. Brant meets Miss Spencer but she is not his acquaintance of the day before. She tells him of Naida, and he accidentally meets her again as he is returning to the ballroom with a fan for Miss Spencer.

CHAPTER XV.—He fails to discover her identity.

CHAPTER XVI.—Brant accompanies Naida home from the dance. On the way she informs him as to who she is, and that she is to meet Hampton. Brant meets Hampton with her, and the men make an appointment to meet the following morning.

CHAPTER XVII.—Brant and Hampton meet. Hampton informs the lieutenant that his attentions to Naida must cease, and proclaims an authority over her that justifies the statement. Brant tells Hampton of the presence of Silent Murphy, and the fact that Red Slavin receives government messages fer him.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Miss Spencer called on Bob Hampton. Tells him of a red-faced stranger mistaking her for Naida.

CHAPTER XIX.—Hampton interviews Red Slavin. Finds that he is an ex-trooper in the Seventh cavalry. It was Slavin's and Murphy's testimony that more than ten years before had convicted Robert Nolan, then a captain in the Seventh, of the murder of Maj. Brant, Sr. Hampton attempts to force a confession from Slavin. Slavin insists it is Murphy he wants, and Murphy has left. In a scuffle Slavin is killed by a knife thrust.

CHAPTER XX.—Hampton surrenders to Buck Mason, marshal. Mob attempts to capture him. Mason and his prisoner escape to a hill and defend themselves. Mob lights fire to burn them out.

CHAPTER XXI.—Brant tells Naida that he loves her. She tells him there is an insurmountable barrier between them, but that she does not fully understand it.

CHAPTER XXII.—Brant and his troop rescues Hampton and Mason from the fires set by the mob. Brant carries the unconscious gambler through the lines of fire.

CHAPTER XXIII.—Hampton is taken to the hotel and Naida comes to nurse him.

CHAPTER XXIV.—Miss Spencer has a humorous adventure with her admirers and then accepts the heart and hand of Rev. Wynkoop.

CHAPTER XXV.—Brant is ordered to take the field. Before he goes Naida tells him she loves him, but cannot become his wife, or cannot offer an explanation. He insists that he will return to her.

CHAPTER XXVI.—Hampton goes on the trail of Silent Murphy, then at Cheyenne, as the one man who can clear Capt. Nolan of the charge of murder of Maj. Brant 15 years before.

TEMPERANCE ABROAD.

It is not only south of Mason and Dixon's line nor only in the United States that prohibition and other forms of temperance work are being pushed. The countries of the Old World or some of them, are feeling the same impulse, and are making or proposing some extraordinary measures for the abatement of the drinking evil. It was supposed years ago that the socalled Gothenburg system in Sweden was a permanent solution of the problem, but recently it has been deemed necessary to revise that system in a radical manner. In Great Britain in some way a marked decrease in the consumption of liquors is noted, and measures are in contemplation for promoting that process through Parliamentary or local enactments. Now come reports to the same effect from Germany. The Prussian Minister of Justice is leading a movement for the abolition of compulsory beer drinking among university students, and even to discourage voluntary guzzling, while a formidable petition has been presented to the government for the separation of sober and drunken persons on railroad trains by the use of special cars, though there seems to be some uncertainty whether the cars should be reserved for those who are sober or for those who are tipsy.

Up in Finland the most remarkable anti-alcoholic legislation of all has actually been enacted and now awaits the Grand Duke's approval, which it may not receive. Largely because of woman suffrage and the spread of the Socialist propaganda, the most stringent prohibition bill on record has been passed by the Diet. This amazing measure not only forbids all manufacture or sale of spirits, beer and wine, but it prohibits any traffic in alcohol of any kind, save through a strict government monopoly. Churches are forbidden, under heavy penalties, to use wine in the communion service. People who had wines in their possession before the enactment of the law may continue to hold them, but any one hereafter acquiring any liquors will be subject to fine and imprisonment. The police and other officials are authorized, without special warrant and on mere suspicion, to enter and search any house for liquors. Any ship entering Finnish waters with a cargo consisting largely of alcoholic liquors will be seized and confiscated. All the breweries, distilleries and liquor stores and shops in the country must at once go out of business, without compensation. Indeed, in framing the law the Diet seems really to have acted upon the exhortation of one of its members, Baroness Gripenberg, to "leave reason aside and let sentiment prevail."

These things at least serve to emphasize the point which we have frequently made in these columns, that complaints of puritanism and fanaticism in this country as contrasted with the liberalism of Europe are not altogether well founded. More than one European country is taking even more advanced ground in temperance reform than has been proposed here. We cannot recall any American prohibition law as stringent as that which Finland is seeking to establish. When in one of our states it was discovered that through inadvertence the law was so drawn as possibly to prevent the use of wine at the communion services of churches it was quickly and generally conceded that an amendment must be made so that there would be no interference with worship. But in Finland the clause expressly banishing wine from the communion table was purposely inserted into the bill. The interference with "personal liberty" in sumptuary matters is far more marked in several European countries than it is here. The merits of some of our temperance legislation may be open to discussion; but at least it cannot be truthfully maintained that this country or any part of it is alone or unique or even extremely advanced in meddling with man's supposed right to get drunk.

A TOUGH LOT.

It is not surprising that so many of us have such hard work to be decent. Just remember that the first man to dwell upon the earth was no saint. If we can rely upon history he was a liar and a sneak. The first woman kept bad company, and woman-like, pried into things that did not concern her. The first child born was a murderer, and killed his brother. Our first ancestors were a bough lot, and it is hard to get it out of the blood.—Oakland Journal.

All that, brother dear, has been atoned for.

The bad that is in us now is there by our own consent, our own indulgence—if not our own will.

So if you would be "decent," the essential requirement is—"cease to do evil and learn to do good."

Especially don't hold any of your ancestors responsible for a debt that has been paid, but for yourself do as the Rev. Sam Jones enjoined—

Quit your meanness!—Frostburg Mining Journal.

Now will you be good?

Petrified Nut Found at Depth of Twenty-Five Feet.

One day last week at the White Rock Sand Company's plant, located a few miles west of Oakland on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, a perfect specimen of the common butternut, encased in its outer shell and perfect in every detail, was unearthed at a depth of twenty-five feet, the nut being embedded in a solid boulder, and was petrified as hard as flint.

Mr. C. F. Hammond, owner of the plant where the nut was discovered, exhibited the find to a number of gentlemen on Saturday night. It was weighed and was a fraction heavier than three ounces.

At the plant where the nut was found there is no evidence of a tree bearing the nut, but as other specimens have been brought to the surface one is naturally led to believe that at one time the butternut tree was prolific at that place.

The average farmer is probably not aware of the fact that an average mule sells for $10 a head more than horses. Such is the case, and the price has been gradually rising for a number of years. There has never been what would be called an over-production of mules, while the market has often been unable to fully supply.

County Commissioner Otho Fike, of District No. 11, was a social caller at this office Tuesday afternoon. Mr. Fike, we believe, will make an excellent public official. In the few moments conversation with him he impressed us as being broad-minded, well informed and a gentleman of good business qualities.

This paper recently received a short communication from Mr. L. H. Karn, formerly of Oakland, but now a resident of Port Orange, Fla., in which he stated that everything in the land of sunshine was going along in its beaten path and that the mercury registered 85 degrees on November 25th, the day upon which he penned the note.

The fellow who stops his paper because he becomes offended at some item that does not suit his fancy, always imagines he is getting even with the publisher, but he is never missed. This only happens occasionally for there are only a few people in any community who imagine a paper should contain nothing but what they approve of.

Mrs. G. Semmes Hamill and little son, who spent several weeks with Baltimore relatives, returned to their home in Oakland last Friday afternoon.

The coal is of good quality and the demand at the present time far exceeding the output.

Mr. W. Creed Dunnington, formerly of Hotel Chautauqua, Mountain Lake Park, but now proprietor of The Inn, Kingwood, West Va., spent Saturday in Oakland on business. As a hotel man Mr. Dunnington stands preeminent and the hostelry which he is operating at Kingwood is taking first rank as a modern stopping place for the traveling public.

The finest Coffee Substitute ever made has recently been produced by Dr. Shoop of Racine, Wis. You don't have to boil it twenty or thirty minutes. "Made in a minute," says the doctor. "Health Coffee" is really the closest Coffee Imitation ever yet produced. Not a grain of real Coffee in it either. Health Coffee Imitation is made from pure toasted cereals or grains, with malt, nuts, etc. Really it would fool an expert—were he to unknowingly drink it for Coffee. Sold by all dealers.

Members of Oakland Lodge No. 192, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons, will meet on next Tuesday evening for the purpose of electing officers for next year. The regular meeting for the election would be on Tuesday, the 24th inst., but as this will be Christmas Eve, a dispensation has been granted the local lodge to hold the election on the evening above mentioned, when all members are requested to be present.

The "big head" is a popular way of expressing a common and very frequent ailment. It arises from various sources, but the real foundation is a lack of sense. A little money develops it in some people; a few good clothes gives it to others; a little office, where a chance is given to exercise a little authority, is often the cause of it, while others get it having a little better job than their associates. The truth is no sensible person gets the "big head." The one who became stuck up and stiff-necked from sources of any kind, are weak in the intellectual caliber.

A tickling cough, from any cause, is quickly stopped by Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure. And it is so thoroughly harmless and safe, that Dr. Shoop tells mothers everywhere to give it without hesitation even to very young babes. The wholesome green leaves and tender stems of a lung healing mountainous shrub, furnish the curative properties of Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure. It calms the cough, and heals the sore and sensative bronchial membranes. No opium, no chloroform, nothing harsh used to injure or suppress, simply a resinous plant extract, that helps to heal aching lungs. The Spaniards call this shrub which the Doctor uses, "The Sacred Herb." Demand Dr. Shoop's. Take no other. Sold by all dealers.

Young men, you are the architects of your own fortunes. Rely upon your own strength of body and soul. Take for your star, self-reliance. Don't take too much advice—keep at your helm and steer your own ship, and remember that the great art of commanding is to take a fair share of the work. Think well of yourself. Strike out. Assume your own position. Put potatoes in a cart over a rough road, and the small ones go to the bottom. Rise above the envious and jealous. Fire above the mark you intend to hit. Energy, invincible determination, with a right motive, are the levers that move the world. Be in earnest. Be self-reliant. Be generous. Be civil. Read the papers. Advertise your business. Make money, and do good with it.

A Rowing Lesson.

By Jane Ludlum Lee.

Copyright, 1907, by J. Morgan.

"Come along, Dora, and I'll take you for a row on the sound. You have darned stockings until I have the fidgets."

"I thought you did not know how to row, Julia. At least that is what you told Colonel Winston the other day when he asked you to row him over to that coal barge of his."

"I wasn't going to row that big fat colonel across Puget sound just to exercise my muscles, and a little white fib now and then won't hurt anybody. Come along."

Dora finally gathered up her stocking bag and, with a suggestion of "take your life in your hand" expression, started down the hill with Julia.

Several of the hotel employees were about the float and helped the girls to find a boat that was fairly clean. One of them stepped up, saying: "Are you going to row yourself, Miss Abbot? Puget sound is a bit tricky at times, and the harbor is pretty full of boats just now. Better take a man along."

"I don't want a man along. That's just why I am going for a row—to get rid of the men. The piazza is full of them, and anyway Mrs. Mills and I are both good swimmers. Push her off, John."

Julia seemed to pull a pretty good stroke for a girl who had said in presence of witnesses that she could not row, and soon Dora's frightened expression had faded into one of content as a soft breeze blew across her forehead.

"I thought you couldn't row, Julia."

"Of course I can row. Who ever heard of a college girl that couldn't? You see, I went to Cornell, and we girls had a rowing club to compete with the boys. Fred—you know Fred,

"WAS THERE MONEY IN THE BAG OR JEWELS?"

don't you? Well, he used to coach me on Saturdays, and that is how I have such a good stroke."

"Do you mean Fred Conroy that went to Japan last year?"

"Course I do! Whom did you think I meant?"

"I thought you never mentioned his name any more. I know I referred to him a month or so ago, and you politely asked me never to refer to him in your presence again—that he was 'a dead one,' I think you said."

"Well, he is dead—that is, as far as I am concerned—and, oh, Dora, I sometimes feel that maybe he really is dead, and it's all my fault!"

With this last remark Julia gave a couple of terrific pulls on the oars as if to emphasize the meaning of it, and crash they went into a little sailboat that lay at anchor.

"Even if he is dead there is no use of our joining him in this watery grave, Julia. Please look where you are going or I'll get out."

"Did you think of walking ashore or driving, Dora?"

"Well, I didn't want to come, Julia Abbot, and you know it, and I'll just thank you to row me ashore and leave me to my daraing."

"Oh, Dora, I'm sorry you're cross, and I'm sorry I said anything! Only the thought of Fred way out there in Japan nearly drives me crazy. I'll give you a lesson in rowing if you'll come over here and take one oar."

After much persuasion and argument Dora began to collect her belongings and tuck up her skirts preparatory to moving over on the seat with Julia. The harbor was full of boats, and they had quite an audience, but Julia had made up her mind that Dora should take a lesson, and she bullied her into making the change. The boat 'urched about as Dora came over, and, with a scream, she pointed to a large bundle that fell overboard.

"My stockings, my stockings!" she screamed, pointing frantically at the bag that was still floating.

"Well, of all the sillies," exclaimed Julia, "to bring your darning with you in a rowboat. Wait a minute, I can reach it."

She leaned over the edge of the boat, which was a small, round bottomed affair, lost her balance and darted over the side into the water. Screams arose from all sides of "Woman over board!" while Dora set up a frantic moan, wringing her hands, but not daring to move otherwise in her helpless situation.

In a second Julia was swimming toward the bag, and laughingly she grabbed it. By this time several sailors were overboard to her rescue, but she refused all offers of assistance. She swam to the nearest large vessel, which was a tea barge from Japan that had anchored there to leave its freight.

"Won't you go to my friend?" she said as they offered her assistance. "She is really very much frightened. Please row her over here, and then we can go home."

Julia climbed up the gangway in her dripping raiment and sank into a chair that the pilot offered her. The girl was a wreck in more ways than one.

"I'll be all right in a minute," she said to the pilot—"just as soon as I can get my breath. You see, my friend lost her bag overboard, and I—well, I just fell reaching for it. Awfully stupid of me, wasn't it?"

"Was there money in the bag or jewels?" asked the pilot with some concern.

"Neither—just stockings," meekly replied Julia as she held up to his view an armful of sopping hosiery.

"Stockings!" yelled the surprised pilot. "What will women do next? Ha, ha!" Turning around, he called, "I say, Conroy, come along here and see what we rescued while I help the rest of the party aboard."

Julia did not laugh, but sat up very straight when the name of Conroy was mentioned. How silly, she thought! Conroy is a simple enough name, and she leaned back again in the easy steamer chair. But not for very long. A tall, pale and sickly looking face appeared at the door, peering around in search of the rescued party. His glance finally fell upon Julia and met hers, and the college girl who had won medals for her bravery and muscle was just woman enough to faint as she gasped his name.

In a moment or two he was at her side, imploring her to look at him, while Mrs. Mills and the pilot seemed suddenly struck blind and walked around the deck.

"Julia, my Julia! Darling, look at me once more that I may know it is you! Water, you lazy dumbhead!" he called to a passing sailor. "Can't you see the lady has fainted?"

The water seemed to revive her, and she leaned back into his arms as she had done in the chair before.

"Fred, it is Julia, or, rather, what is left of her. Let me rest in your arms a minute, dear, just to make sure it's you. Fred, dear, why are you so pale?"

"Just a bit of yellow fever, dear, but it put me in bed for a few weeks and gave me time enough to yearn for you and to know that I could never be happy without you, so I shipped with this old tea vessel, and here I am. Will you give yourself to me now, dear?"

"I cannot give you what is already yours, Fred, only I hope for your sake that I'll make a better wife than I did a rowing teacher."

She Gave Tolstoi a Tip.

In his reminiscences of Leo Tolstoi in his later years, says Transatlantic Tales, Ivan Bulanovski relates the following anecdote:

One day the count was standing on the platform of a railway station of Tula when an express train came whizzing up and stopped. A young man jumped out of a first class compartment and hurried to the refreshment room. A young lady followed him to the platform, calling, "George, George!" but George did not hear.

"Little grandfather," she said, turning to Tolstoi, who stood close by, "do me a favor! Run after that man and tell him that I want him. I will give you a tip."

Count Tolstoi did as requested and received 5 kopecks for his trouble. Meanwhile the platform had gradually filled with people, and the young lady heard the passengers saying to each other:

"Look, look! There is Tolstoi!"

"Where is Tolstoi?" she hastened to inquire.

The great Russian writer was pointed out to her, and with lightning speed she rushed toward him and begged to be forgiven.

"Forgive me, count! I am so ashamed. Do forgive me, I beg of you," and she shamefacedly asked for the return of the 5 kopecks.

"Oh, no," Tolstoi replied, with a laugh, "the 5 kopecks were honestly earned."

Tastes In Tobacco.

There's no accounting for tastes. Take tobacco, for instance.

The man who smokes a pipe wants to commit murder if he gets on the back platform of a car and finds a callow youth smoking a ready made cigarette. He sniffs disdainfully every time the offensive odor gets into his nostrils, and the youth's features bear a look of disgust if he gets a whiff of what he considers an evil smelling pipe.

The cigar smoker may smoke both pipe and cigarettes, but usually he abhors both.

The man who smokes Havanas will throw away a domestic after a couple of puffs, provided the friend who gave it to him is out of sight.

The cigar smoker will scorn a stogie.

The confirmed smoker of stogies doesn't give a rap about a "good" cigar. The smoker of "good" cigars will say it is because his taste has degenerated from smoking an inferior grade of tobacco.

And then again there is the man who will smoke any old thing that will burn.—Milwaukee Free Press.

THE CHURCH AT WORK

HISTORIC INDIANA CHURCH.

Belleview Edifice Which Has Been the Center of Many Notable Incidents.

Surrounded by scenery as beautiful as there is to be found in Indiana stands the historic old Belleview church at Homestead, in Dearborn county, Indiana. Here Edward Eggleston, as the assistant to the preacher in charge, rode his first circuit, and here it was, in this early home of Indiana Methodism, that Morgan's raiders, wounded and bleeding, were carried into an improvised hospital in its sacred shelter.

Belleview M. E. church was built in 1852 and has been a prosperous charge on the Guilford circuit all these years. Its walls have echoed with the eloquence of many a noted Methodist divine. The church is well preserved and seems good for a hundred years more. One of the features of its history is that, during the celebrated raid of John Morgan, the church was used as a hospital.

As is indicated by its name the church stands on an elevation overlooking the valley of the Great Miami and from its rear is as pretty a view as can be found in southeastern Indiana. Hardinsburg lies at its feet in the lower bottom. The battle was known at the time as the battle of Hardinsburg, Homestead being a product of more recent years.

Because of its historic associations several notable Methodist gatherings have been held at Belleview.

CHANGES IN CHINESE WORSHIP.

Money Formerly Wasted on Ancestral Rites Used to Educate People.

Some months ago the Shanghai Taotai suggested that the large sums of money squandered on ancestral rites should be used for modern education. Already a remarkable response has come from the Chinese of Singapore, who have decided to devote to education the money hitherto spent in processions and feasts in ancestor worship. It is estimated that some $100,000 will thus be made available. This indicates an attitude of mind towards ancestor worship which is quite unprecedented.

If the millions of China would act upon the advice of the Shanghai magistrate, not only would a great obstacle to missionary work be removed, but the national finances would be materially helped by the economizing of the extravagant and useless outlay which is said to cost the empire some $100,000,000 annually.

A remarkable imperial edict announces that Confucius has been elevated to a position of equality with heaven and earth, the supramundane powers, as the Chinese regard them, inferior only to Shang-Ti, the supreme ruler. This step seems to have been taken to avoid the difficulty which has existed in the case of Chinese Christian students, who had conscientious scruples with regard to the "worship of Confucius" which was required of all who sought admittance to the new schools and colleges. As a result of this edict Confucius will now be regarded as above the plane where worship is permitted for any except the emperor. Thus, says Record of Christian Work, by a clever ruse a great difficulty has been removed from the educated Chinese Christians.

Interdenominational Beneficence.

The late Edmund P. Dwight, who died in Philadelphia in 1903, and left large sums of money to religious causes, evidently was not a strong denominationalist. The orphans' court of Philadelphia has just awarded these bequests: Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, $50,000; Presbyterian Church of America, $50,000; Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, $20,000; Young Men's Christian Association, $15,000; and American Sunday School Union, $15,000.

Small Pay.

The average salary paid to the missionary is as follows: To the unmarried college-bred man, $700; to the married man, $1,000 to $1,200 (with $100 extra for each child); to the unmarried woman, $500 to $700. The basis for fixing the remuneration is not compensation for work done, but merely support.

Fresh Air Work Supervision.

Rev. John B. Devins, D. D., the editor of the New York Observer, has been appointed superintendent of the fresh air fund of New York city, which for 30 years has been providing country outings for the children of the slums in hot summer weather.

The News.

"Ah, ha!" says Abner Henderson, behind the grocery fire,
"I see they's news frum Hopkinton in this here County Lyre!
It sez, 'A bouncing baby boy is born t' Henry Bell,'
And Hank, it sez, 'is sick abed, the mother doin' well!'
Now this reminds me, boys, of when th' mother run away
With Henry Bell an' married him in spite of Abner Day.
Yew see, her pa was rather proud and owned a bank er two,
While Hank—his pa was 'Old Man' Bell; his ma was Sary Crew.

"He sorter worked his way through school, reportin' on th' Press,
An' seemed t' somehow git above his fambly run, I guess.
He writ short poems and sich truck which sounded kinda queer,
And some folks hinted, 'Henry Bell is gittin' cracked, I fear!'
When Susan Day tuk up with him, th' town was horryfied;
Her pa at onct giv out th' news, he'd ruther she had died!
And then he swore, acrost his heart, that if she married Hank,
He'd disinherit her fer good and take away her bank!

"She cried a lot, as wimmen will, and pleaded with her dad,
But he gist stomped around and roared—I tell yew he was mad!
They run away next day by rail and hitched up on the sly.
She telegraphed her dad th' news: 'We're happy, pa. Good bye!'
Nobody heerd a word frum them fer gist about a year,
And all th' world fer Abner Day was destitute of cheer!
Then rumor come from Hopkinton—'twas gist th' faintest breath—
That fer a month er two, b' gosh, they almost starved t' death!

"Th' next thing Henry writ a book that sold like all git out!
'Th' best big seller of th' year!' It made th' hum folks shout!
But Abner Day refused t' bend and sniffed at Henry's pluck,
Refusin' t' be reconciled, an' sed 't was mostly luck!
Hum! Hum! I see by this report—What's that? Her pa is there?
'To spend a week or so in town a-visitin' his heir'?
Well, great jehosiphat! I guess that gal at last has won—
She's got her Henry and her dad—and, now, she's got a son!

THE "WHITE RIBBON."

Influence This Badge of Purity Exerted Over One Life.

At a camp meeting I was attending one summer, a certain public meeting was being held, and a large number were present, writes Rev. O. W. Scott in Home Herald.

During the service a young lady arose, and, while in the act of removing her jacket, she exposed a small bow of white ribbon on her breast.

A little farther to the rear, two gentlemen were seated side by side. They were utter strangers to each other.

One asked the other, "What is that bow of ribbon on the young lady's dress?" His neighbor replied, "That is a badge which the women of the Woman's Christian Temperance union wear," and he went on to describe its use and significance.

The first speaker then said: "I once had a sister who wore one, but she is now in heaven." Saying this he withdrew from the service, and, as it proved afterward, under deep conviction, and returned to his hotel in the village near by.

For hours there in his room he had a long struggle. He was wrought upon mightily by the holy spirit, and at last yielding, he was happily and soundly converted. He had not seen the young lady wearing the badge to speak to her, and she was all unconscious of her silent influence until the following morning, when a letter was handed to her from this stranger.

The purport of the letter was this: When he saw the little white bow it carried him back to his boyhood days, and revived the memory of his sister who had worn the "white ribbon." He wrote that some influence had brought him over from the village to the camp, for which he was most grateful. He revealed that he was a "drummer" for a liquor firm in a certain city, but that he was through with that buisiness, for he had promised God that he would never sell another drop of rum so long as he lived.

He added: "You don't know what you have done for me, though you have never spoken a word to me. I am going home to-day. I spent the past night mostly on my knees, and I was saved, and God told me that it was all right with my soul. May God bless you and help you to wear the 'ribbon,' and may it and you help many more as you have helped me. Pray for me."

Truly the "white ribbon" has preached many a sermon for purity and righteousness.

ITS POSITION PLAIN.

The Catholic Church Vigorously Fighting the Saloon.

The saloon has become the germ-center of lawlessness.

While it debauches some of the people with drunkenness and takes from them that knowledge necessary for an intelligent ballot, it snaps its fingers at the law made for its restriction. It has become the unscrupulous and conscienceless tyrant of American politics.

There are three great causes of drunkenness in this country to-day. The saloon is one of them, and perhaps the greatest, and the so-called moderate drinker is another.

The Catholic church is putting up a strenuous fight against the drink evil, by using all the resources in her power to antagonize the saloon and at the same time put in its place the substitutes for the saloon.—Very Rev. Alexander P. Doyle, of the Catholic university of Washington.

A New Organization.

The name of a new organization is "The Student Recruits for the Christian Ministry," and it originated only a short time ago at a college Young Men's Christian association conference at Pacific Grove, Cal. One-fourth of the men present bound themselves together with an avowed purpose "to become ministers of Jesus Christ and to aggressively promote the consideration of the ministry as a vocation for Christian young men."

Wins Against the Saloon.

The great struggle in Indian territory between the federal government, represented by William E. Johnson, special officer of the department of the interior, and the drink traffic, is over. The federal government, thanks to the prowess and absolute fearlessness of its agent, has won out. As a dozen papers in the territory have recently announced in glaring headlines, "The beer period is over."

The Inspiration of Bad Politics.

The saloon, as the center and inspiration of bad politics, bad government, disorder, poverty and sin, has now been scheduled for extermination, not by fanatics and theorists alone, but by practical and clear-headed workers along lines of public welfare, who will hardly cease before that evil institution, as it is known to-day, shall have been laid to rest—Editorial in Collier's Weekly.

The Death Rate Among Drinkers.

The conclusion reached from the statistics gathered during the past year by the register general of England, as to the average number of deaths among 61,215 persons was that there were two deaths among drinkers and three among liquor sellers for every one among abstainers.

WANTS BETTER ROADS.

Carville D. Benson Would Build Great Thoroughfares Through the State.

Mr. Carville D. Benson, Speaker of the last and member of the next Legislature, thinks the time has arrived for a strong advance movement by the State in the matter of good roads, and will introduce a bill in the Legislature providing for the construction by the State of long-distance improved roads between important terminals, roads that will constitute the main arteries of traffic in the State.

"My idea," he said this morning, "is to supplement the Shoemaker law by providing for the construction by the State of improved roads between important centres, running through several counties if necessary—a following up of the precedent established by the last Legislature in authorizing the building of the Baltimore-to-Washington boulevard.

"Most of these roads naturally would have Baltimore as one terminus, although I think there should be one running the whole length of the Eastern Shore, with branch roads to various shipping points on the bay and rivers. One from Baltimore to Belair naturally suggests itself, and there are many others.

"I think the work should be on the line of acquiring and improving toll roads, as far as possible. A toll road is a very expensive thing. The indirect taxation paid by users of them is far greater that the direct taxation would be if the State acquired these roads and improved them.

"There are at least three roads within the limits of Baltimore city on which toll is charged—the Liberty pike, the Reisterstown pike and the Frederick pike. This is a rather absurd state of affairs. It is the biggest argument the Annex residents have against paying full city taxes. They say, naturally, that they are paying a heavy tax already in the tolls levied against them.

"Many of these toll roads are anything but a profitable investment to the owners, and some of them have been abandoned. Some would probably be turned over to the State for nothing, or they could be purchased at a nominal figure. They could be used to advantage in the scheme which I have in mind.

"The state should do this work rather than the counties, as it can do it more satisfactorily. Under the Shoemaker law some trouble has arisen because different districts of a county held different opinions as to the advisability of new road construction. In Baltimore county, for instance, the people of the First district wanted Wilkens avenue improved, whereas the people of the Thirteenth district, through which also the avenue runs, didn't think it worth the cost. It was finally arranged only by changing the boundary line of the district, so as to bring the avenue altogether within the First district.

"It might be best also to let the State pay the full cost of construction of these roads, though I am not certain of this. If we don't, we will be up against this proposition—the counties will object to the improvement. They will want to do the work themselves, saying they can do it cheaper than the State. As a matter of fact, they cannot, except by building inferior roads. The State Bureau of Highways is the best organization we have to look after these things.

"If the State pays for the work, it will receive its compensation in the increased development and increased taxable basis. But this end of the problem can be investigated and the best method adopted. I do not propose that all this work be done at once, but a start should be made at once. In 10 or 15 years there would be a tremendous improvement throughout the State."

The Republican for Job Printing.

STEERING WITHOUT A RUDDER

Keeping a Steamship on Its Course by Its Screws.

An exceedingly clever feat was performed a week or two ago by the captain of the steamship Kaiser Wilhelm II. Shortly after the vessel started across the Atlantic from New York its rudder became disabled and useless. When the sea is reasonably calm, as it is in summer, a sort of substitute can sometimes be put in place of a rudder without waiting to get into port. That plan is not feasible always, and is hardly to be thought of in winter, when the ocean is stormy. Another method of holding a vessel to it course has, however, been discovered, though it requires great skill and has been employed thus for only with steamers having two screw propellers, each driven by a separate engine.

The Kaiser Wilhelm II has two engines of the kind in which the work is done with pistons. Ordinarily, the engines go ahead or reverse simultaneously, but each can be used independently of the other. The right hand engine can be driven at full speed, while the left hand one is either slowed down or stopped, or the left hand engine can be made to work at its full capacity while the right one it slowed. Now, if the backward thrust against the water by the two screws is equal, the ship ought to keep her course fairly well, though the wind and waves often play mean tricks even then in causing deviations. On the other hand, if one screw does more work than the other, the vessel's course will change. If the right hand screw exerts the strongest push, the bow will swing to the left, and if the left hand screw exerts the strong pressure, the vessel's head will swing in the other directon. By following this plan the captain of the Kaiser Wilhelm II got his ship safely to the English Channel, where she made two calls, and finally to her home port, Bremen. It was necessary to sacrifice a little of her speed, and her arrival was delayed, but the ship was kept from going astray or stopping entirely until some other vessel came along and helped her.

Just now a kind of engine which has no piston is coming into use for driving steamships. This is the turbine. With two notable exceptions it has been arranged so that one engine operates three shafts and three screws. Such is the case with the Caronia, for instance. On that vessel the steam goes first to the middle cylinder, and, after partial expansion there, is led into the two side cylinders for further work. Now, if one side cylinder could be shut off and and its shaft stopped while the other side cylinder, the same result could be reached as was attained with the Kaiser Wilhelm II. There is room for doubt, however, whether provision has been made for varying the speed of one side screw independently of the other. If it was necessary either to shut the cylinder off completely or leave it working at its full force, steering with the screws would seem difficult, if not impossible. In the case here considered the the right hand cylinder is not a separate engine, but separate part o the same engine to which the left hand cylinder belongs.

Whatever uncertainty there may be in regard to steamships like the Caronia, it is probable that the new Cunard liner Lusitania (and her sister, the Maoretania) could be steered as the Bremen steamer was. Lusitania has four shafts, but they are driven by two separate engines. Each engine is made up of one high pressure and one low pressure cylinder, the two screws on the right hand of the rudder being worked by one engine and the two on the left by the other engine. It might not be possible to slow down the screws rotated by the right hand low pressure cylinder without slowing down the other right hand screw, but they could both be slowed down or stopped while the left hand pair were kept busy.

SIXTIETH CONGRESS ORGANIZED MONDAY

Hon. Joseph G. Cannon Re-Elected Speaker of House of Representatives.

THE SESSION WAS VERY BRIEF

More of a Social Function Than a Gathering for the Transaction of Important Business—William Jennings Bryan Present Accorded Reception.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 2.—Double-gaveled detonations sounded promptly on the stroke of 12 today at the wide-winged Capitol pile on the hill, and the Sixtieth Congress flashed into existence. In the Senate Vice President Fairbanks, with customary lack of violence, tapped the sounding board, while in the House Clerk McDowell awoke the echoes with half a dozen crashing, all-compelling slams. Then a bit of quiet, prayers by the chaplains, and a resumption in both chambers of the hum of the temporarily discontinued conversation of the chosen reunited.

In both Senate and House the galleries, private and public, were crowded to the doors, and outside in the corridors long lines of the patient, but improvident, stood ticketless, awaiting the exit of the hopelessly bored. Lots of folks who had carefully saved blank Senate and House gallery tickets from last year to cunningly fill them in for this grand opening day were destined to be disappointed, as only special bits of pasteboard were honored by the doorkeepers. And quite a while before the fruitful noon moment for which the birth of a new Congress was scheduled the special-ticket holders—femininity in gowns from Paris, France, and Paris, Ill., jewels of price and the tottering towered hats of present fashion, mere males in the inevitable frock coats and shiny hats—were holding down all the seats tiered above history making chambers.

In both Senate and House details of organization were first considered. In the upper branch of the National legislature, which is a continuing body, no formal organization was necessary, and after the swearing in of the new members and some other routine business official notice was given of the deaths of Senator Morgan and Pettus, and adjournment out of respect was had until tomorrow. Senators Owen and Gore of Oklahoma were not sworn in, the Senate declining to recognize their gubernatorial appointments and condemning them to wait for their togas until the legislature of the new state shall appoint them in due form.

In the House all members were sworn in. Speaker Cannon and other House officers already caucus-chosen, were formally elected and the regular new-Congress drawing for seats was held. The President's message will be read in both houses tomorrow.

The Senate convened promptly at 12 noon. After Vice President Fairbanks sounded the gavel the proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Chaplain of the Senate.

Senator La Follette was the first senator to be recognized, and presented the credentials of Senator Isaac Stephenson of Wisconsin.

The Vice President ordered that the roll of senators-elect be called alphabetically, and they were sworn in by fours, being escorted to the desk by their colleagues.

All of the senators-elect were present in the chamber except Senator Bankhead of Alabama, who is detained at his home by illness.

Under the form observed by the Senate neither Senator Bankhead nor Senator Johnsson can be sworn in until the deaths of Senators Morgan and Pettus have been announced, and as the Senate adjourned in their honor neither of their successors was admitted.

Messrs. Robert L. Owen and T. P. Gore of Oklahoma, not having been elected to the Senate by their legislature, were not received by the Senate and their credentials will not be accepted until after their formal election on the 10th instant.

The Vice President ordered the call of the roll and Senator Lodge questioned the method of procedure, saying his idea was that the roll should have been called before the swearing in new senators, but the Vice President maintained that for fourteen years, at the beginning of a new Congress, the proceeding had been in accordance with his ruling. The roll call showed eighty-five senators present.

Resolutions providing for a committee to inform the President that Congress had assembled and is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make were adopted, and Senators Allison and Teller were designated to wait upon the President.

Senator Teller offered resolutions of respect to the memory of Senators Morgan and Pettus of Alabama, and they were adopted, and the Senate adjourned at 12:37 p. m. until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

Today's opening session of the House was a real record breaker. Enthusiasm was unrestrained, racket unfettered, there were more spectators in the corridors than in many years, and the number of bills thrown into the hopper was something near 4,000.

Promptly at noon the clerk of the House brought down his gavel with a smash. Chaplain Couden offered up prayer, and without further preliminaries the roll was called by state delegations. After other necessary preliminaries the House got down to business and elected Mr. Cannon Speaker by 207 to 154, Representative John Sharp Williams receiving the Democratic vote.

A committee, consisting of Representatives Williams, James of Kentucky and Sulloway of New Hampshire, was appointed to bring the Speaker into the House. Amid thunderous applause, in which Republicans and Democrats alike joined, Speaker Cannon was escorted down the center aisle to his chair.

In a brief speech Representative Williams said the speakership was the second highest office in the United States. He had the honor, he said, for the third time "of not introducing, but presenting to the Congress of the United States the Hon. Joseph G. Cannon of Illinois as its Speaker."

Then occurred the most interesting event of the day and one that demonstrated to the spectators in the galleries—no one around the Capitol needed any evidence on the subject—just what Uncle Joe's colleagues think of him. For when he came in on the floor, escorted by John Sharp Williams, and ascended the rostrum to his big high-backed chair, the racket that broke loose made everything else in the way of applause a single handclap by comparison. Ordinary cheers mingled with the oldtime rebel yell. Democrats and Republicans hollered until they were hoarse, pretty nearly every man on the floor banged his desk lid up and down like a schoolboy with the teacher out of the room. The demonstration lasted for five minutes, and was a tribute of enthusiasm and noise that no one around here has received in equal measure for many a long day.

For over an hour today before the House of Representatives convened William Jennings Bryan was the central figure in the lobby back of the Speaker's desk. He was given a cordial greeting, and afterward conferred with Representatives John Sharp Williams, James of Kentucky, Bartlett of Georgia and others, although he declared that these conferences were without significance.

Mr. Bryan, as an ex-member of the House was entitled to the privileges of the floor. He entered the chamber at 11:45 o'clock and was given an ovation by the Democrats and the occupants of the galleries.

Station Agent H. A. Rasche was in Cumberland Thursday evening, returning to Oakland Friday morning.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1907. NUMBER 41

MESHAC SHULTZ AN OLD PIONEER.

Died at Shipman, Ill., Aged Seventy-Seven Years.

AN OLD SETTLER OF GARRETT.

Then a Part of Allegany County—Mrs. Royer, a Sister, Over Ninety Still Living Near Grantsville. Story of The Family.

Meshac Shultz died December 3, 1907, his home in Shipman, Illinois, in his th year. On the 29th of the past month came a fatal stroke of paralysis, which deprived him of all consciousness to the close of life. He had been a well and active man beyond his years, but death came suddenly and unexpected. He left a widow, a member of the well known Augustine family, and six living children; three sons and three daughters; all comfortably situated in the great state of Illinois.

He was one of the 18 children of Adam Shultz born at the old Shultz Stone House, near Salisbury, Somerset county, Pennsylvania. Three brothers died in this year: Alexander, in Kansas; Chancey F., of St. Louis, and Meshac. Only four members of this numerous and prominent family remain alive, but strange as it may seem the first of the 18 is living, Mrs. Eliza Royer, of Garrett Co., Md., high up in her nineties, but sound and healthy in mind and body.

The Shultz family about the year 1836 moved to Grantsville, Md., where they lived, prospered and were prominent for many years. They were engaged in the tannery and leather business for a number of years. The old father died in 1864 in Grantsville, and rests in the cemetery at that place. Some of the family had already gone West. Soon thereafter all the family followed with the one exception mentioned. This exodus as it may be termed, was considerately and wisely made many years

It was plainly for the better, as all saw. None of them ever regretted the change. They had the foresight to see the advantages of the resourceful and prosperous West. Meshac had a fine farm at Grartsville, but sold it and went west to join the Shultz family. During the last summer season he made his final home visit to the Grantsville region, and had a warm greeting. Several years ago he retired from active business with a considerable surplus from fair dealings for the use of his worthy family. He was a grandson of a revolutionary soldier, Christian Shocky.

Meshac Shultz was honest fair and even generous where generosity was proper.

He was sociable, warm and friendly with a lively and cheerful disposition, his society quite pleasant and acceptable. As a husband he was affectionate and faithful to a devoted wife for a period equal to the "golden fifty" or more. As a parent, watchful and helpful of a well bread family of children. In religion he was deeply pious for long years a devoted member of the Lutheran church—for more than a generation the soul of it in his home town. Much of his time and means were given for its workings. The thriving town of Shipman has met with a loss, not soon to be repaired, and many persons in his old home regions will share in the loss, including him, who offers this poor tribute. AN OLD FRIEND.

Dec. 8, 1907.

ATTACKED BY GOV. WARFIELD.

Democratic Leaders Accused of Sharp Practices in Senatorial Primary.

In a statement given out last Friday evening Gov. Warfield announces that his expenses in the Senatorial primary amounted to $1,222.82, which money, he says, was spent legitimately. He then proceeds to criticise the Democratic organization which sent word down the line to support John Walter Smith, notwithstanding that he (Warfield) had consented to go into the fight solely for the purpose of electing the Democratic ticket.

He reviews the vote cast in the various counties in the State controlled by the organization and cites the fact that his successful opponent had in some of these received more votes than there were Democratic votes cast at the regular election. The governor intimates he did not receive fair treatment, and resents the manner in which he was beaten.

FIKE.

The weather last week was stormy and the roads are very bad to travel.

Alta Umble, daughter of Lloyd Umble, has been ill some time and is being attended by Dr. Meyers, of Markleysburg, Pa.

Mr. P. F. Fike and family of Uniontown, Pa., are visiting relatives and friends around here.

Most of the people of this vicinity have butchered their hogs. There was complaint in general that they could not get their hogs fat.

Mr. John S. Fike was on the sick list for a short time.

Wm. H. Thomas has a large bunch of furs on hand at present and will continue to buy all he can get.

Geo. W. Bowser and John R. Fike were up to Oakland last week on business.

The teachers around here are making preperations for closing their schools for the holidays on Dec. 20, 1907.

Most Horrible Tragedy in History of Coal Mining

Hundreds of Lives Lost Friday Morning Caused by the Explosion of Gas in Monongah Mines---Story of the Carnage Wrought and Scenes Depitced by Leo J. Rasche

MONONGAH, W. Va., December 7.—The disastor which occurred here at 10:25 o'clock Friday morning becomes more appalling as the hours advance and at the time I arrived on the scene at 8:30 there were fully 2,000 people assembled around the mouth of No. 6 mine anxiously awaiting for news of those entombed.

At this time there was no hope entertained for the lives of those who were in the mines and the whole city was plunged in sorrow by the distressing accident which robbed it suddenly of at least 100 of its best citizens not to mention the 300 and some foreigners making a total of at least 425 who were killed in the mines.

Many women, mostly foreigners, were seen about the mouth of the mines and most all of them bore the marks of their fingernails which were inflicted Friday morning when the news of the horrible disaster first reached them.

Ropes were stretched upon the bank aboye the mines along which runs the street car line and here there was such a solid mass of humanity that it was with great difficulty that I was able to penetrate to the steps leading down to the mines, where a sentry kept a vigorous watch to bar troublesome intruders from the mouth of the mine, who went solely out of morbid curiosity.

At this time no one had been recovered. The first figures of the catastrophe had been placed too low, and the list of fatalities instead of being 300, will reach over 400. Friday morning 425 men took out working checks and nearly all of these entered the mines. About eight miners stated that there are at least 415 men in the mines.

At this time the rescuing party which was constantly being relieved by others as the poisonous fumes overcame them and the hard work tired them out, ceased to work as vigorously as at first, all being convinced that every single man in the mines was dead, and in No. 6 mine the rescuers penetrated about one mile.

They have yet about one quarter of a mile to go before they reach the point where the bodies lie. Just about this point is situated the tunnel which connects the two mines, and which communicated the explosion from No. 8 to No. 6.

The explosion was terrific and shook the earth in this vicinity as though an earthquake had suddenly rumbled beneath the surface. The mine cars inside the mines at the time were mostly all turned upside down and Fred Cooper, the motorman, was found under one of these in No 6 mine badly crushed. It was supposed that he was blown from the car and before it stopped was run over. Some of the brick from the engine house of No. 8 were found about a quarter of a mile away.

At 7:30 o'clock last evening the body of Charles Honiker, who was at first supposed to have been blown into the the river, was found under the debris at the mouth of mine No. 8.

William Bice, who ran the fan at No. 8 mine, was so badly injured that he was put in an ambulance and started to a Fairmont hospital, but he died on the way and was brought back to his home here.

A colored man whose name could not be learned, was also so badly injured that he died at 6:30 o'clock last evening.

Francisco Lario was found early after the catastrophe in No. 8 mine lying on the dead body of his brother. He is insane from the shock.

The new First National Bank building which has just recently been completed, but which has not yet been occupied, has been turned into a temporary morgue and there the bodies are taken as fast as they are recovered.

About 12 undertakers were in the morgue at 10:25, representing Eli Musgrave & Sons, R. L. Cunningham, R. C. Jones Undertaking Co., C. S. Cleppy and John H. Clifford, all of Clarksburg.

Two bodies only were in the morgue at this time, the others which were recovered having been kept in the mines in order to keep down the excitement of the people.

The storage room where the mine cars are kept at No. 6 mine was also turned into a temporary morgue and there a great crowd was assembled in order to identify the dead.

Your correspondent was able, after obtaining permission from Mr. Hall, the gentleman in charge of the work at No. 6, to penetrate about 500 feet into the mine but was unable to withstand the poisonous fumes and was compelled to return. Several of the miners also, who were too hasty in the work of the rescue, were almost overcome. The progress into the interior of the mine was very slow on account of the fact that brattices had to be constantly built as the men worked their way in so that the air would keep in circulation in order to drive away the "black damp," or "after damp" as it is called by the miners.

In a conversation with Martin Cole, assistant boss of drivers in No. 8 mine, he stated that not less than 425 men were killed and that out of his own force he had but three left. On account of a very fortunate sickness he was not in the mines.

The bodies of John Harman, Lonny Hinerman and Fred Cooper were carried out of No. 6 mine last night, having been in the mine since morning where they were kept in order to suppress the anxiety of the people.

The capacity of the fans was excellent and the mines were supposed to be the best equipped in the state. The capacity of No. 6 was 200,000 feet of air per minute and that of No. 8 was 240,000 per minute.

The air fans at No. 8 mine were got in running order at a little after 1 o'clock last night and a few minutes after the bodies of Howard Preston, a negro and four Italians were brought out through a "toad hole," a place where the coal is worked out near the surface of the mine. When found they were all lying face downward, showing that they had been suffocated and had fallen in this manner to protest themselves from the poisonous "black damp." They were found about one mile from the mouth of the mine and there was about two feet of dust at that point.

No. 8 mine caught fire at 3:00 o'clock this morning and the flames raged fiercely for a time, but were soon gotten under control. Hose companies No. 1 and 2 hurried to the mine and after a time were able to extinguish the fire which threatened the cremation of the dead miners within.

From 3:00 o'clock on there were no developments of any great importance, more than the occasional fainting of the relief men.

The wreckage at the mouth of No. 8 mine is simply indescribable and it is impossible to estimate the great force that would be necessary to tear loose such a solid mass of stone. The mass of earth and stone that was lifted would be about 40 feet deep and it was torn away for a space of about an equal number of yards and blown to atoms, leaving nothing but a jagged gap.

The two mines are about one mile apart and a trolley car ran constantly from one to another throughout the night carrying hot coffee and sandwiches for the refreshment of the relief corps.

Almost all the business houses of Monongah were closed immediately following the disaster and a funeral pall seemed to have settled over the town. It was a gruesome sight to see the great number of teams engaged in hauling the cots on which rested the corpses which were in all sorts of shapes. There were also a large number of teams which were constantly going back and forth hauling coffins and rough boxes.

The citizens of Monongah are a generous hearted and extremely hospitable people and are very courteous to the stranger under the trying circumstances to which they have been so called upon to undergo. While the men are entombed and they are not called upon to look upon so many dead, they scarcely appear to realize the intensity of the catastrophe, excepting the foreign women, who wailed piteously whenever they approached the mines.

At 8:30 o'clock a special train bearing President Oscar G. Murray, General Manager Thomas Fitzgerald, Vice president Potter, and Superintendent Williams, of the B. & O. arrived in Monongah. They had been on an inspection trip, but hearing of the disaster, they hastened at once to the scene.

President C. W. Watson, of the Fairmont Coal Company, rushed to the scene in a special train from Parkersburg.

I succeded in gaining a few moments interview with President Watson shortly after midnight but he was unable to explain the cause of the disaster and stated that it grieved him much. "Nos. 6 and 8," he said, "are the finest mines of the Fairmont Coal Company, and every precaution had been taken for the safety of the miners."

He further stated that they were the best equipped mines in the state and that the tunnel connecting the two was dug solely for the purpose of giving better air circulation. In this the miners bear out his statements and none of them place the least blame on the company.

Gas was the only cause they say, and the accumulation of gas cannot be prevented, but they are unable to say why the fans, which were working well, did not keep the air clear and simply give as their theory that a pocket was struck somewhere in the mine which had too much pressure for the fans to overcome.

One miner stated that he understood that a train of cars had broken loose while being drawn out of No. 8 mine and in running back into the pit struck with such force at the bottom that the sparks emitted by the sudden contact ignited the gas with the appalling results which have been hitherto narrated.

This statement could not be verified, but several gave as their opinion that this was probable.

John T. McGraw, the pit boss, had just entered the mine about three minutes prior to the explosion and had remarked sometime, upon entering, to the fanman, Bice, about the air not being strong enough, to which Bice replied that everything was all right. McGraw was a member of the Citizens' Band, of Fairmont and was well known to the writer.

At 9 o'clock this morning five members of the relief corps were carried out of No. 8 mine by their fellow workmen in an unconscious condition, having been almost suffocated and it required great effort to restore them.

There are great numbers of experts from all over the country who hurried to the scene and at least 5,000 people were gathered around the mines this morning.

Up until noon to day there were only 11 men recovered and at Fairmont the crowds were pouring in on every train and stampeding the trolley cars in an endeavor to reach the dreadful scene of death and destruction.

Crime Was Committed in Oakland July 18th Last, Hood Being Admitted to Bond By The Court Shortly Afterward.

Monday the criminal docket was taken up in the Circuit Court for this county, since which time the bar and Court have been engaged in trying and disposing of the cases.

Tuesday morning the case of Charles Hood, indicted for the murder of Robert Clingan, which crime was committed in Oakland on July 18th last, was tried before Judges Boyd and Henderson, sitting as a jury. The case was presented for the State by Mr. Thayer and Mr. Peddicord appeared for the traverser.

The testimony of the State's witnesses tended to show that Hood assualted Clingan with a pop bottle, striking him over the head, which produced a concussion of the brain, his death resulting within a very few minutes thereafter.

The Court rendered its verdict yesterday morning and passed sentence upon Hood confining him to the Maryland Penitentiary for a term of five years.

HUNTING FATALITY AT BLOOMINGTON.

Alonzo Buckhannon, While Hunting Rabbits, Shot Himself.

Last Thursday morning Alonzo Buckhannon, son of Hanson Buckhannon, residing at Bloomington, fatally shot himself while hunting rabbits near that town, dying alone in the woods after dragging himself a hundred yards or more from the spot where the shooting took place.

How the accident occurred will probably never be known, as the young man was unaccompanied and so far as known there were no eye-witnesses. The spot where the shooting is presumably to have taken plabe is where his gun was found lying on the ground, which had exploded in some manner, the charge of shot entering his left side. From there the young man endeavored to reach his home or some place where he could receive help, but his strength evidently failed after he had gone a distance of a hundred yards or more. The deceased was aged 21 years.

QUEER MODES OF TRAVEL.

Poor Substitute for the Horse in Oriental Countries.

A writer for "The National Geographic Magazine" lays great stress on the service to civilization which is rendered by the horse. That animal, he says, is found chiefly in those countries which lie within the temperate zone, and which may be regarded as Occidental. There are believed to be 100,000,000 horses in the world today, and four-fifths of them are in the regions just indicated. In tropical and Oriental countries the work of carrying burdens and drawing vehicles is performed by donkeys, oxen or buffaloes, camels, elephants and man himself.

The writer just mentioned, O. P. Austin, of the National Bureau of Statistics, has information about the numbers of these animals employed in the work described. He has reason to thing that there are 3,000,000 camels, 20,000,000 buffaloes and 10,000,000 donkeys. In the United States and Canada there is one horse on an average to every three and a half persons; in Mexico, one to every twelve; in Japan, one to every forty; in the Philippines, one to every fifty, and in India and Southern China one to every 200.

Mr. Austin estimates the weight a horse will carry at from 200 to 250 pounds, a donkey from 100 to 200, an ox about the same, the llama (South American relative of the camel) from 50 to 200, the true camel from 350 to 500 and the elephant from 1,800 to 2,500 pounds. A man can carry from 75 to 150 pounds, though his ability depends not only on his general strength but also on the method of sustaining the load. If he uses a neck, as the Chinaman does, and divides the burden, he may be able to handle more than if he takes it in a single package. In Southern Europe and in Asiatic countries a practice is common which is notable for the skill exhibited rather than the weight sustained. Women often poise on their heads huge parcels or jars containing some fluid. For instance, milk is thus brought into Manila from the rural districts. So deftly are these loads balanced that they do not need to be put in place and removed.

Of course, if a burden is put on wheels it can be moved by man or beast more easily than if actually carried. In Belgium and some other countries carts are drawn by dogs. The same kind of animal pulls the sledges of the Esquimau, and Laplander, though the reindeer also performs such service in the Arctic regions. Camels usually carry freight and passengers on their backs, but occasionally they are hitched to wagons. Palanquins are sometimes borne by camels walking tandem, the two poles of the vehicle being exceptionally long. Their front ends by the leader and the near ends by the second one, the poles resting in straps which hang down on either side of the animal from a sort of saddle. India women of rank use a carriage drawn by a pair of bullocks, but also ride in palanquins having human bearers.

Still another vehicle which is much patronized in Oriental countries is the jinriksha. This has two wheels and a top like a buggy, and is drawn by a man or boy. This jinriksha is provided with two rods which correspond to the thills of a buggy, but are shorter. The forward ends are connected by a crossbar, against which the man leans when pulling the vehicle. Heavy carts for freight are arranged in the srme general way, but are pushed from behind. In the island of Madeira a low sled, drawn by oxen, if often used for transporting passengers, who are sheltered from the sun by a rude canopy.

Primitive but igenious methods of crossing a stream are sometimes practiced in India. Mr. Austin says that huge bags, made of buffalo skin and inflated like balloons, are employed there as rafts. Rawhide ropes are made to serve as bridges. The same writer refers also to the houseboat of the Chinaman, which is a place of residence, not a means of transportation. Millions of Chinamen lives in such craft, the boats being anchored in large rivers or harbors. These floating abodes usually contain a remarkable combination of things. There are conveniences for cooking a tiny flower garden at one end and a pigsty at the other. The boats are often sculled from one place to another by the mother of the family, with her children playing about her and her youngest strapped upon her back.

AGRICULTURAL PROSPERITY.

All predictions that the present financial disturbance will be brief and not severe are based upon this country's large crops and the general prosperity of the farming community. How vast a part the farm plays in creating national wealth may be learned from the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture. The total value of farm products in 1907 was $7,412,000,000, an increase of more than $600,000,000 over the value of the 1906 crops, of more than a billion over the value of the crops of each of the two-proceding years and 57 per cent greater than the value of the crops of 1899. How stupendous is this source of national wealth may be seen from Mr. Wilson's declaration that the crops of eight years, it equal in value to that of 1907, would pay for "duplicating "every mile of steam railroads in the country and pay for their cost, terminals, rolling stock and all property. In thirteen years they would replace the present banking power of the United States in banking capital, surplus deposits and circulation, and in seventeen years they would replace the banking power of the world." The bulk of our exports are agricultural products. They sustain our credit abroad, and it is on the strength of American crops already sold or to be sold abroad that the bankers of this country have been able to obtain the $100,000,000 or more of gold recently brought to or engaged for this country. The shortage of the wheat crop, much greater in other parts of the world than in this country, insures a strong foreign demand for American wheat at high prices.

Conditions with respect to the great agricultural sections of this country are very different now from those prevailing in 1893. In that year, when a business recession ended in general disaster, the farmers were not prosperous. Western farms were covered with mortgages. The crops were adding little to the national wealth. The financial trouble extended to the farming communities. Farm values fell and banking institutions interested in mortgages on farm lands were ruined by their losses. If the American farmer had been creating wealth then as rapidly as he is today the panic of 1893 could not have lasted so long and brought so much distress as it did. If we are suffering from a psychologic condition, our greatest producing class enjoys a splendid immunity from that condition. If we are injuriously affected by waste and destruction of capital, the farmer is producing new capital at a more rapid rate than ever before in the country's history. His strong position is almost a guarantee of the future.

Churches to Unite.

The Baltimore American of yesterday says: There is no doubt but that at the meeting of the General Conference of Methodist Protestants in May next plans will be formulated for the union of that denomination with the Congregationalists and United Brethren. Such plans were prepared sometime ago, but when submitted to the Congregationalists the latter found that there was a spirit of dissension in their ranks and it was deemed advisable not to do anything that might cause a split. Therefore, the matter was dropped for the time.

OVERWORK MAY CAUSE CRIME

Mental Strain Render Men Unaccountable.

There is no doubt that overwork often unhinges the nervous system and renders the victim irresponsible for his actions, and weakens his power of self-control.

The banker is confined to his counter, the student is tempted to push his sedentary habits into the hours required for repose, the public man and politician undergo every form of mental strain. The cerebral system is overtaxed, the normal controlling power becomes diminished, and the person becomes more of less for a certain time abnormal, not only in his judgment, but in his natural propensities.

To such an extent is this sometimes seen that crime is often the result of this disordered state of the nervous system.

Overwork not only increases the number of the insane, as is admitted by all, but, as I have just stated, is responsible for an increase in crime. Where crime exists there is often bad insanity, and vice versa, so what leads to one result will obviously leads to one other. Increased cerebral activity is the cause of this calamity.

The evils of excessive study generally do not act in one direction only, they manifest themselves in a morbid condition of the organ of thought, which reacting on the mind itself, disorders its manifestations. Excessive mental thought causes disorganization of the while nervous system and fibers of the delicately made brain.

It is a well known psychological fact that suicide is often the result of an overworked brain, and a desire to commit murder can often be attributed to the same cause. These, in my opinion, are two of the most terrible crimes that can possible be committed.

Excessive mental labor has thus often stolen away many a valuable life which might, with ordinary precaution, have been saved. The attack is often sudden, the brain having been pressed till it can go no further, suddenly collapses and gives way. The long and gallant struggle with circumstances, the work of toil, tells the tale when the brain refuses to further respond. I believe that many cases of crime can be traced to the overwork and over pressure which is going on in our large public schools and our universities.

I hold a very strong opinion that before overwork can produce crime in an ivdividual it must first weaken the nervous system, and produce an incipient form of mental disorder.

I cannot see that overwork per se can in any way be stated to be a cause for crime unless, as I have said before, the brain is partially affected, and as a result in some cases, the mental and moral power of control is lost and a criminal act is often the direct result.

The evils of excessive study generally, and not simply in one exclusive direction, manifest themselves in morbid conditions of the organ of thought, which, reacting on the mind itself, disorders its manifestations.

Hence, it has often been observed how narrow the bonds are between madness and crime, and how frequently the organ breaks down under the strain to which it has been subjected; hence it is that many intellectual suns have arisen in brightness, and set in darkness; have illumined the world by their morning or midday glory, and then they have been forever eclipsed by suicide, insanity, or crime.

Maryland's Unique Senatorial Distinction.

Maryland enjoys the distinction of having the oldest, as well as the youngest, member of the Sixtieth Congress, which is now in session, and not the least remarkable circumstance of this coincidence is the difference in their respective walks of life. Senator William Pinkney Whyte, Maryland's "Grand Old Man," is a grandson of William Pinkney, perhaps the ablest lawyer of his day and one who served his State and country in many responsible positions. Senator Whyte, now in his eighty-fourth vear, is still vigorous in mind and body, during the recent campaign in Maryland stumped the State with the same intensity of feeling and brilliance of oratory as he did 50 years ago. In his long public career he has filled with honor every high office within the gift of the people of his State. Harry Wolf, the infant of the House of Representrtives, was born and reared under conditions just the opposite. Compelled in early life to make his living, young Wolf sold newspapers; later he became an office boy, and finally studied law. This was accomplished only through privations which would have subdued the ardor of a less resolute character, but this ambitious young man plodded on with energy, pluck snd ability, and when a little more than 25 years of age he carried a district which for many years had been represented by a Republican. The distinguished grandson of the illustrious Pinkney reached out his fatherly hand to the once barefooted Wolf, guiding the boy along the lines of a useful and honored public servant.

FISHNET MACHINE.

It Ties Exactly The Same Knot That Is Usually Made by Hand.

Machines which will knit stockings and underwear have been known for fifty years or more. One which will lessen the labor of making nets for fishermen is much more of a novelty. Norway is a country which has large fishing interests, and one of her sons, Cornelius Lie, of Bergen, has invented such apparatus.

The thread used in making a net is first wound on a big spool, either by hand or with the assistance of a special winder, which is supplied with each machine. It is said that the stitch is identical with the one made by hand in weaving a net, and is extremely neat and firm. The mechanism shown near the end of the long steel rod is for the purpose of keeping the rows of meshes parallel during the construction of the net, and this, combined with the excellence of the "handmade" knot, has the effect of giving the net a good stretch and hang. The machine is operated by turning a large wheel.

There is no limit to the length of the net which can be made on the machine, and the width may reach four hundred meshes. The arm which carries the row of meshes as these are formed can be made longer, and thus a larger width of net can be obtained. If it is desired to have a net tapering away at the end like the belly of a trawnet, that can be done by dropping a mesh at each side as each row of meshes is formed. The machine is, to a large extent, handmade, and it has been worked at the rate of about sixty to eighty knots a minute. It is estimated that it will be possible to place the machine on the market at a price not far exceeding $90.

SENATOR DAVIS TO MARRY.

It is Said The Ceremony Will Take Place January First.

Notwithstanding the positive denial of Ex-Senator Henry G. Davis and Miss Maud Ashford of their engagement and probable early marriage, it is learned today on unquestionable authority that an engagement has existed for six weeks, and that the wedding day is fixed for January 1. That the announcement of last Monday was premature, but true, has been the general opinion in society, notwithstanding the flat denial of Mr. Davis, Miss Ashford and Mr. Davis' daughter—Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, wife of the Senator from West Virginia, and Mrs. Arthur Lee.

The relation between the 84-year-old bridegroom-elect and his daughters are at present badly strained, but friends of the family believe a better understanding will prevail before the wedding day, as the affection of the aged statesman for his children has been one of his chief characteristics all through life. That Mrs. Lee is opposed to the marriage comes as a surprise to many who have known of the intimacy existing between her and Miss Ashford from girlhood. Miss Ashford was her social secretary throughout last season.

Miss Ashford, who is the daughter of the late Mahlon Ashford of the District bar, has always been identified with Washington's smart resident set.

Mrs. John T. Davis, the young daughter-in-law of the Senator, is said to be in entire sympathy with the romance. Since the death of his wife five or six years age Mr. Davis has divided his time between this, his former home, and the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Lee on Massachusetts avenue. His summers are always passed at his estate in West Virginia, where Miss Ashford was a guest for five weeks last summer.

It is said his fortune, estimated variously from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000, will be divided in a way satisfactory to his future wife, his children and grandchildren.

The former are Mrs. Elkins, Mrs. Lee and John T. Davis. Mrs. Elkins has four sons and one daughter. Mrs. Lee has four children, the eldest 7 years of age, while Mr. and Mrs. John T. Davis have only one child, a little girl. Another prospective heir to the West Virginian's millions is Miss Katharine Davis Brown, only child of the late Commander R. M. G. Brown, U. S. N., whose deceased wife was a daughter of the Ex-Senator.

Miss Ashford told a friend today that the intention had been to announce her engagement on Christmas Day, when all distressing complicatications of family and business affairs such as are now confronting Mr. Davis would probably have been amicably adjusted.

GLOBULAR LIGHTNING.

Formed With a Clear Sky Before a Storm.

In the latest issue of "The United States Weather Review" there appears an account of a remarkable phenomenon observed in Burlington Vt., last July. The conditions were favorable to the development of thunderstorms on the day in question, and one rather heavy, short shower really did occur. While the rain was falling no thunder or lightning was noticed, but a few minutes before the storm there appeared a slowly moving globe of fire, which passed passed almost horizontally over the tops of the buildings and then exploded. The noise was so loud that many persons feared that some building had been wrecked by dynamite, and then looked for bricks or other fragments of the structure in the air. No visible harm was done, however, except that a horse was so frightened that it fell to the pavement, but the sound was loud enough to be heard all over Burlington.

One observer describes the globe as having a diameter of from eight to ten inches before it exploded, but leaving a halo as many feet through for several seconds. Another man reported having seen an elongated object, resembling a torpedo six feet long and eight inches in diameter. The difference in the stories may have been due to the fact that at one instant the globe moved rapidly enough to look like a streak, whereas at another time it travelled slowly.

Ball lightning is an exceedingly rare phenomenon, but there are well authenticated instances o[f] Most of the accounts given of it agree in saying that it lasts for several seconds, and rolls along the ground or a house top, without injuring anything seriously, if at all. As it always comes as a surprise, accurate measurements of size and time are impossible, but there can be little doubt about the main facts. The most novel feature in the case here reported seems to have been the formation of the globe before the storm.

Oil Well Pays Preacher's Salary.

A few years ago the Rev. George Hood Anderson organized the Epworth Methodist Episcopal church and later secured sufficient funds to erect a modern stone structure. Knowing there was oil about Lima, he conceived the idea of boring a well in the church's back lot.

A subscription paper was passed, $1,200 was pledged to make up losses if they came and the Rev. Mr. Anderson started his oil well. It proved a small type gusher, and ever since the oil well, operated daily by a gas engine, which also operates the church heating and lighting plant, has been pouring out sufficient crude oil to not only pay the minister's salary and all other church expenses, but to make up a bank account big enough to build the church over again.—Lima Cor. Columbus Dispatch.

PENSION CONFEDERATES.

Hobson Thinks Congress Ought to Add to What South Pays.

Richmond Pearson Hobson, the Alabama sailor, statesman, and hero of the Merrimac in Santiago harbor, intends to ask Congress to pension Confederate soldiers. He is preparing a bill, which he will introduce, and has written Gov. Hoke Smith for data concerning Georgia's Confederate pension roll.

Hobson says his purpose is to have the national government appropriate an amount so the Confederate veter[ans] now on the rolls of the States of South may receive from the nation[al] government a pension sufficient when added to that received from the State government to equal that received by Union veterans.

The South, says Hobson, has long been contributing to pay the pensions of Northern soldiers, and as the United States has adopted a policy of returning war indemnities to foreign nations, he thinks the government ought to return a small part of the pension money already paid by the Southern States.

To Whiten Hands.

A safe bleach for the hands is to rub them well with a lotion made of equal parts of lemon juice and glycerine. Let this dry on the hands and wear a heavy pair of gloves all night. In the morning rinse off the lotion with hot water, into which put a few drops of tincture of benzoin.

2t W. A. MAFFETT, Constable.

The woman who is always well and neatly dressed is able to exercise a greater influence for good than one who is the reverse. The well dressed woman is attractive to the eye and the eye is one of the main avenues to the heart. Other things being equal, her influence is more potent than her neighbor's, whose reputation of dressing "just as it happens" at home in some indefinable way casts a shade over whatever virtue she may possess. A woman neatly dressed is ready for emergencies. The chance caller and the unexpected guest find her ready to receive them. But perhaps the greatest necessity for looking well at home exists in the home itself. To the members of their families they owe the first duty.

At last they saddled up and passed down the coulee into the more precipitous depths of the narrow canyon.

Their early advance was slow and cautious, as they never felt certain what hidden enemies might lurk behind the sharp corners of the winding defile, and they kept vigilant eyes upon the serrated skyline. The savages were moving north and so were they.

It was fully three o'clock when they attained to the bank of the Powder and crouched among the rocks to wait for the shades of night to shroud their further advance. Murphy climbed the bluff for a wider view, bearing Hampton's field-glasses slung across his shoulder, for the latter would not leave him alone with the horses. He returned finally to grunt out that there was nothing special in sight, except a shifting of those smoke signals to points farther north. Then they lay down again, Hampton smoking. Murphy either sleeping or pretending to sleep. And slowly the shadows of another black night swept down and shut them in.

It must have been two hours later when they ventured forth. Silence and loneliness brooded everywhere, not so much as a breath of air stirring the leaves. Murphy continued to lead, the light tread of his horse barely audible, Hampton pressing closely behind, revolver in hand, the two packhorses trailing in the rear.

Midnight, and they pulled up amid the deeper gloom of a great, overhanging bluff, having numerous trees near its summit. There was the glow of a distant fire upon their left, which reddened the sky, and reflected oddly on the edges of a vast cloud-mass rolling up threateningly from the west.

Their horses stood with heads hanging wearily down, their sides rising and falling, and Hampton, rolling stiffly from the saddle, hastily loosened his girth.

"They'll drop under us if we don't give them an hour or two," he said, quietly. "They're both dead beat."

Murphy muttered something, incoherent and garnished with oaths, and for a moment he succeeded in releasing the buckle, sank down limp at the very feet of his horse, rolling up into a queer ball. The other stared and took a step nearer.

"What's the matter? Are you sick, Murphy?"

"No—tired—don't want ter see—thet thing agin."

"What thing?"

"Thet green, devlish,—crawlin' face—if ye must know!" And he twisted his long, ape-like arms across his eyes, lying curled up as a dog might.

For a moment Hampton stood gazing down upon him, listening to his incoherent mutterings, his own face grave and sympathetic. Then he moved back and sat down. Suddenly the full conception of what this meant came to his mind—the man had gone mad. The strained cords of that diseased brain had snapped in the presence of imagined terrors, and now all was chaos. The horror of it overwhelmed Hampton; not only did this unexpected denouement leave him utterly hopeless, but what was he to do with the fellow? They were in the very heart of the Indian country,—the country of the savage Sioux. He stared at the curled-up man, now silent and breathing heavily as if asleep. If he only might light a pipe, or boil himself a cup of black coffee! Murphy never stirred; the horses were seemingly too weary to browse. Then Hampton nodded and sank into an uneasy doze.

CHAPTER XXX.
Alone with the Insane.

Beneath the shade of uplifted arms Murphy's eyes remained unclosed. Whatever terrors may have dominated that diseased brain, the one purpose of revenge and escape never deserted it. With patient cunning he could plan and wait, scheme and execute. He was all animal now, dreaming only of how to tear and kill.

He was many minutes thoroughly satisfying himself that Hampton actually slept. His every movement was slow, crafty, cowardly, the savage in his perverted nature becoming more and more manifest. It was more beast than man that finally crept forward on all-fours, the eyes gleaming cruel as a cat's in the night. Within a yard of the peacefully slumbering man he rose up, crouching on his toes and bending stealthily forward, possibly feeling the close proximity of that horrible presence. Then the maniac took one more stealthy, slouching step nearer, and flung himself at the exposed throat, uttering a fierce snarl as his fingers clutched the soft flesh. Hampton awoke, gasping and choking, to find those mad eyes glaring into his own, those murderous hands throttling him with the strength of madness.

At first the stupefied, half-awakened man struggled as if in delirium, scarcely realizing the danger. He was aware of suffering, of horror, of suffocation. Then the brain flashed into life, and he grappled fiercely with his dread antagonist. Murphy snapped like a mad dog, his lips snarling curses; but Hampton fought silently, desperately, his brain clearing as he succeeded in wrenching those claws from his lacerated throat, and forced his way up on to one knee. He worked his way, inch by inch, to his feet, his slender figure rigid as steel and closed in upon the other, but Murphy writhed out of his grasp, as a snake might. The younger man realized now to the full his peril, and his hand slipped down to the gun upon his hip. There was a sudden glint in the faint starlight as he struck, and the stunned maniac went down quivering, and lay motionless on the hard ground. With the quick decision of one long accustomed to meet emergencies, Hampton unbuckled the lariat from one of the led animals and bound Murphy's hands and limbs securely.

As he worked he thought rapidly. He comprehended the extreme desperation of their present situation. While the revolver blow might possibly restore Murphy to a degree of sanity, it was far more probable that he would awaken violent. Yet he could not deliberately leave this man to meet a fate of horror in the wilderness. That which would have been quickly decided had he been alone became a most serious problem when considered in connection with the insane, helpless scout. Then, there were the dispatches! They must be of vital importance to have required the sending of Murphy forth on so dangerous a ride; other lives, ay, the result of the entire campaign might depend upon their early delivery. Hampton had been a soldier, the spirit of the service was still with him, and that thought brought him to final decision. Unless they were halted by Sioux bullets, they would push on toward the Big Horn and Custer should have the papers.

He knelt down beside Murphy, unbuckled the leather dispatch bag, and rebuckled it across his own shoulder. Then he set to work to revive the prostrate man. The eyes, when opened, stared up at him, wild and glaring; the ugly face bore the expression of abject fear. The man was no longer violent; he had become a child, frightened at the dark.

Securely strapping Murphy to his saddle and packing all their remaining store of provisions upon one horse, leaving the other to follow or remain behind as it pleased, he advanced directly into the hills, steering by aid of the stars, his left hand ever on Murphy's bridle rein, his low voice of expostulation seeking to calm the other's wild fancies and to curb his violent speech.

At dawn they were in a narrow gorge among the hills, a dark and gloomy hole, yet a peculiarly safe spot in which to hide, having steep, rocky ledges on either side, with sufficient grass for the horses. Leaving Murphy bound, Hampton clambered up the front of the rock to where he was able to look out. All was silent and his heart sank as he surveyed the brown sterile hills stretching to the horizon, having merely narrow gulches of rock and sand between, the sheer nakedness of the picture unrelieved by green shrub or any living thing. Then, almost despairing, he slid back, stretched himself out amid the soft grass, and sank into the slumber of exhaustion, his conscious memory the incoherent babbling of his insane companion.

He awoke shortly after noon, feeling refreshed and renewed in both body and mind. Murphy was sleeping when he first turned to look at him, but he awoke in season to be fed, and accepted the proffered food with all the apparent delight of a child. While he rested, their remaining pack-animal had strayed, and Hampton was compelled to go on with only the two horses, strapping the depleted store of provisions behind his own saddle. Then he carefully hoisted Murphy into place and bound his feet beneath the animal's belly. Then he resumed the journey down one of those sand-strewn depressions pointing toward the Rosebud, pressing the refreshed ponies into a canter, confident now that their greatest measure of safety lay in audacity.

It was already becoming dusk when they swept down into a little nest of green trees and grass. It appeared so suddenly and was such an unexpected oasis amid that surrounding wilderness, that Hampton gave vent to a sudden exclamation of delight. But that was all. Instantly he perceived numerous dark forms leaping from out the shrubbery, and he wheeled his horses to the left, lashing them into a rapid run. It was all over in a moment—a sputtering of rifles, a wild medley of cries, a glimpse of savage figures, and the two were tearing down the rocks, the din of pursuit away behind them. The band were evidently all on foot, yet Hampton continued to press his mount at a swift pace, taking turn after turn about the sharp hills, confident that the hard earth would leave no trace of their passage.

Then suddenly the horse he rode sank like a log, but his tight grip upon the rein of the other landed him on his feet. A stray Sioux bullet had found its mark, but the gallant animal had struggled on until it dropped lifeless; and the brave man it had borne so long and so well bent down and stroked tenderly the unconscious head. Then he shifted the provisions to the back of the other horse, grasped the loose rein once more in his left hand, and started forward on foot.

CHAPTER XXXI.
On the Little Big Horn.

N troop, guarding, much to their emphatically expressed disgust, the more slowly moving pack-train, were following Custer's advancing column of horsemen down the right bank of the Little Big Horn. The troopers, carbines at knee, sitting erect in their saddles, their faces browned by the hot winds of the plains, were riding steadily northward. Beside them, mounted upon a rangy chestnut, Brant kept his watchful eyes on those scattered flankers dotting the summit of the near-by bluff. Suddenly one of these waved his hand eagerly, and the lieutenant went dashing up the sharp ascent.

"What is it, now, Lane?"

"Somethin' movin' out yonder, sir," and the trooper pointed into the southeast. "They're down in a coulee now, I reckon; but will be up on a ridge agin in a minute. I got sight of 'em twice afore I waved."

The officer gazed earnestly in the direction indicated, and was almost immediately rewarded by the glimpse of some indistinct, dark figures dimly showing against the lighter background of sky.

"White men," he announced, shortly. "Come with me."

At a brisk trot they rode out, the trooper lagging a pace to the rear, the watchful eyes of both men sweeping suspiciously across the prairie. The two parties met suddenly upon the summit of a sharp ridge and Brant drew in his horse with an exclamation of astonishment. It was a pathetic spectacle he stared at—a horse scarcely able to stagger forward; on his back, with feet strapped securely beneath and hands bound to the high pommel, the lips grinning ferociously, perched a misshapen creature clothed as a man. Beside these, hatless, his shoes barely holding together, a man of slender figure and sunburnt face held the bridle-rein. An instant they gazed at each other, the young officer's eyes filled with sympathetic horror, the other staring apathetically at his rescuer.

"My God! Can this be you, Hampton? What does it mean? Why are you here?"

Hampton, leaning against the trembling horse to keep erect, slowly lifted his hand in a semblance of military salute. "Dispatches from Cheyenne. This is Murphy—went crazy out yonder. For God's sake—water, food!"

"Your canteen, Lane!" exclaimed Brant. "Now hold this cup," and he dashed into it a liberal supply of brandy from a pocket-flask. "Drink that all down, Hampton."

The man did mechanically as he was ordered, his hand never relaxing its grasp of the rein. Then a gleam of reawakened intelligence appeared in his eyes; he glanced up into the leering countenance of Murphy, and then back at those others. "Give me another for him."

Brant handed to him the filled cup, noting as he did so the strange steadiness of the hand which accepted it. Hampton lifted the tin to the figure in the saddle.

"Drink it," he commanded, curtly, "every drop!"

For an instant the maniac glared back at him sullenly; then he appeared to shrink in terror, and drank swiftly.

"We can make the rest of the way now," Hampton announced, quietly. "Lord, but this has been a trip!"

Lane dismounted at Brant's order and assisted Hampton to climb into the vacated saddle. Then the trooper grasped the rein of Murphy's horse, and the little party started toward where the pack-train was hidden in the valley.

"Is Custer here?" said Hampton.

"No; that is, not with my party. We are guarding the pack-train. The others are ahead, and Custer, with five troops, has moved to the right. He is somewhere among those ridges back of the bluff."

The man turned and looked where the officer pointed, shading his eyes with his hand.

"Can you give me a fresh horse, a bite to eat, and a cup of coffee, down there?" he asked, anxiously. "You see I've got to go on."

"Go on? Good God! man, do you realize what you are saying? Why, you can hardly sit the saddle! You carry dispatches, you say? Well, there are plenty of good men in my troop who will volunteer to take them on. You need rest."

"Not much," said Hampton. "I'm fit enough, or shall be as soon as I get food. Good Lord, boy, I am not done up yet, by a long way! It's the cursed loneliness out yonder," he swept his hand toward the horizon, "and the having to care for him that has broken my heart. He went that way clear back on the Powder, and it's been a fight between us ever since. I'll be all right now if you lads will only look after him. This is going to reach Custer, and I'll take it!" He flung back his ragged coat, his hand on the dispatch-bag. "I've earned the right."

Brant reached forth his hand cordially. "That's true; you have. What's more, if you're able to make the trip, there is no one here who will attempt to stop you. But now tell me how this thing happened. I want to know the story before we get in."

For a moment Hampton remained silent, his thoughtful gaze on the near-by videttes, his hands leaning heavily upon the saddle pommel. Perhaps he did not remember clearly; possibly he could not instantly decide just how much of that story to tell. Brant suspected this last to be his difficulty, and he spoke impulsively.

"Hampton, there has been trouble and misunderstanding between us, but that's all past and gone now. I sincerely believe in your purpose of right, and I ask you to trust me. Either of us would give his life if need were, to be of real service to a little girl back yonder in the hills. I don't know what you are to her; I don't ask. I know she has every confidence in you, and that is enough. Now, I want to do what is right with both of you, and if you have a word to say to me regarding this matter, I'll treat it confidentially. This trip with Murphy has some bearing upon Naida Gillis, has it not?"

"Yes."

"Will you tell me the story?"

The thoughtful gray eyes looked at him long and searchingly. "Brant, do you love that girl?"

Just as unwaveringly the blue eyes returned the look. "I do. I have asked her to become my wife."

"And her answer?"

"She said no; that a dead man was between us."

"Is that all you know?"

The younger man bent his head, his face grave and perplexed. "Practically all."

Hampton wet his dry lips with his tongue, his breath quickening.

"And in that she was right," he said at last, his eyes lowered to the ground. "I will tell you why. It was the father of Naida Gillis who was convicted of the murder of Maj. Brant."

"Oh, my father? Is she Capt. Nolan's daughter? But you say 'convicted.' Was there ever any doubt? Do you question his being guilty?"

Hampton pointed in silence to the hideous creature behind them. "That man could tell, but he has gone mad."

Brant endeavored to speak, but the words would not come; his brain seemed paralyzed. Hampton held himself under better control.

"I have confidence, Lieut. Brant, in your honesty," he began, gravely, "and I believe you will strive to do whatever is best for her, if anything should happen to me out yonder. But for the possibility of my being knocked out, I wouldn't talk about this, not even to you. The affair is a long way from being straightened out so as to make a pleasant story, but I'll give you all you actually require to know in order to make it clear to her, provided I shouldn't come back. You see, she doesn't know very much more than you do—only what I was obliged to tell to keep her from getting too closely entangled with you. Maybe I ought to have given her the full story before I started on this trip. I've since wished I had, but you see, I never dreamed it was going to end here, on the Big Horn; besides, I didn't have the nerve.

"That Man Could Tell, But He Has Gone Mad."

"You see, Brant, I feel that I simply have to carry these dispatches through. I have a pride in giving them to Custer myself, because of the trouble I've had in getting them here. But perhaps I may not come back, and in that case there wouldn't be anyone living to tell her the truth. It seems to me that there is going to be a big fight somewhere in these hills before long. So I want to leave these private papers with you until I come back. It will relieve my mind to know they are safe; if I don't come, then I want you to open them and do whatever you decide is best for the little girl. You will do that, won't you?"

He handed over a long manila envelope securely sealed, and the younger man accepted it, noticing that it was unaddressed before depositing it safely in an inner pocket of his fatigue jacket.

"Certainly, Hampton," he said. "Is that all?"

"All except what I am going to tell you now regarding Murphy. There is no use my attempting to explain exactly how I chanced to find out all these things, for they came to me little by little during several years. I knew Nolan, and I knew your father, and I had reason to doubt the guilt of the captain, in spite of the verdict of the jury that condemned him. In fact, I knew at the time, although it was not in my power to prove it, that the two principal witnesses against Nolan lied. I thought I could guess why, but we drifted apart, and finally I lost all track of every one connected with the affair. Then I happened to pick up that girl down in the canyon beyond the Bear Water, and pulled her out alive just because she chanced to be of that sex, and I couldn't stand to see her fall into Indian clutches. I didn't feel any special interest in her at the time, supposing she belonged to Old Gillis, but she somehow grew on me—she's that kind, you know; and when I discovered, purely by accident, that she was Capt. Nolan's girl, but that it all had been kept from her, I just naturally made up my mind I'd dig out the truth if I possibly could, for her sake. The fact is, I began to think a lot about her—not the way you do, you understand; I'm getting too old for that, and have known too much about women,—but maybe somewhat as a father might feel. Anyhow, I wanted to give her a chance, a square deal, so that she wouldn't be ashamed of her own name if ever she found out what it was.

"About that time I fell foul of Murphy and Slavin there in Glencaid. I never got my eyes on Murphy, you know, and Slavin was so changed by that big red beard that I failed to recognize him. But their actions aroused my suspicions, and I went after them good and hard. I wanted to find out what they knew, and why those lies were told on Nolan at the trial. I had an idea they could tell me. So, for a starter I tackled Slavin, supposing we were alone, and I was pumping the facts out of him successfully by holding a gun under his nose, and occasionally jogging his memory, when this fellow Murphy got excited, and chasseed into the game, but happened to nip his partner instead of me. In the course of our little scuffle I chanced to catch a glimpse of the fellow's right hand, and it had a scar on the back of it that looked mighty familiar. I had seen it before, and I wanted to see it again. So, when I got out of that scrape, and the doctor had dug a stray bullet out of my anatomy, there didn't seem to be any one left for me to chase excepting Murphy, for Slavin was dead. I wasn't exactly sure he was the owner of that scar, but I had my suspicions and wanted to verify them. Having struck his trail, I reached Cheyenne just about four hours after he left there with these dispatches for the Big Horn. I caught up with the fellow on the south bank of the Belle Fourche, and being well aware that no threat or gun play would ever force him to confess the truth, I undertook to frighten him by trickery. I brought along some drawing-paper and drew your father's picture in phosphorus and gave him the benefit in the dark. That caught Murphy all right, and everything was coming my way. He threw up his hands and even agreed to come in here with me and tell the whole story, but the poor fellow's brain couldn't stand the strain of the scare I had given him. He went raving mad on the Powder; he jumped on me while I was asleep, and since then every mile has been a little hell. That's the whole of it to date."

They were up with the pack-train by now, and the cavalrymen gazed with interest at the new arrivals. Several among them seemed to recognize Murphy, and crowded about his horse with rough expressions of sympathy. Brant scarcely glanced at them, his grave eyes on Hampton's stern face.

"And what is it you wish me to do?"

"Take care of Murphy. Don't let him remain alone for a minute. If he has any return of reason, compel him to talk. He knows you, and will be as greatly frightened at your presence and knowledge as at mine. Besides, you have fully as much at stake as anyone, for in no other way can the existing barrier between Naida and yourself be broken down."

Insisting that now he felt perfectly fit for any service, the impatient Hampton was quickly supplied with the necessary food and clothing, while Murphy, grown violently abusive, was strapped on a litter between two mules, a guard on either side. Brant rode with the civilian on a sharp trot as far as the head of the pack-train, endeavoring to the very last to persuade the wearied man to relinquish this work to another.

"Foster," he said to the sergeant in command of the advance, "did you chance to notice just what coulee Custer turned into when his column swung to the right?"

"I think it must have been the second yonder, sir; where you see that bunch of trees. We was a long ways back, but I could see the boys plain enough as they come out on the bluff up there. Some of 'em waved their hats back at us. Is this man goin' after them, sir?"

"Yes, he has dispatches from Cheyenne."

"Well he ought ter have no trouble findin' the trail. It ought ter be 'bout plain as a road back in God's country, sir, fer there were more than 200 horses, and they'd leave a good mark even on hard ground."

Brant held out his hand. "I'll certainly do all in my power, Hampton, to bring this out right. You can rely on that, and I will be faithful to the little girl."

The two men clasped hands, their eyes filled with mutual confidence. Then Hampton touched spurs to his horse and galloped swiftly forward.

CHAPTER XXXII.
The Fight in the Valley.

Far below, in the heart of the sunny depression bordering the left bank of the Little Big Horn, the stalwart troopers under Reno's command gazed up the steep bluff to wave farewell to their comrades disappearing to the right. Last of all, Custer halted his horse an instant, silhouetted against the blue sky, and swung his hat before spurring out of sight.

The plan of battle was most simple and direct. It involved a nearly simultaneous attack upon the vast Indian village from below and above, success depending altogether upon the prompt co-operation of the separate detachments. Scarcely had Custer's slender column of horsemen vanished across the summit before Reno's command advanced, trotting down the valley, the Arikara scouts in the lead. They had been chosen to strike the first blow, to force their way into the lower village, and thus to draw the defending warriors to their front, while Custer's men were to charge upon the rear.

A half-mile, a mile, Reno's troops rode, with no sound breaking the silence but the pounding of hoofs, the tinkle of accoutrements. Then, rounding a sharp projection of earth and rock, the scattered lodges of the Indian village already partially revealed to those in advance, the riders were brought to sudden halt by a fierce

A DIFFERENCE.

A great deal is being said and much more will be said in the next year on the question of tariff revision. It is generally conceded that there are some schedules that need adjusting to prevent certain inequalities that have arisen during the years of increasing prosperity. This age would be different from all others if that were not true. The tariff has to be looked after and the schedules adjusted occasionally just the same as the tax rate or any other economic scale. But the great question for the people to think about is whether we want a tariff at all. Our Democratic friends are not half so much concerned about the matter of the adjustment of the tariff as they are with wiping it out altogether and putting the American product and American labor on the same footing as foreign products and foreign labor. The real question is, are we to have tariff adjustment by Republicans, the friends and advocates of protection to American labor and American industries or shall we turn the whole thing over to the enemies of the tariff and protection—the Democratic party led by Mr. Bryan and his free trade allies? These are the vital points for the American people to think about while hunting around to locate an issue and getting ready to cast their votes at next year's election.

What a Risk.

What a risk people take who withdraw their savings from banks and hide them about their homes! Money is the thing that the thief and robber seek above every thing else. It is of more use to him than anything else that he can steal, and it is easier to use it without detection than anything else. In communities where people have their saving in banks, the thieves confine themselves to stealing other things, but when they know that there is money in the house, that is the one thing they seek. And they'll get it, even if they have to commit murder. Your savings are of great value to you, but not so valuable as your life. To make them both safe, put your money in the bank. Don't invite desperate character to torture and murder you by keeping it about the house.

A SKETCH OF THE OLD NATIONAL PIKE

From Indian Trail by Evolution to Great Highway.

THE OLD CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Commenced in 1806—Various Appropriations by the Government—Question of Public Road Improvements a Political One.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Good many years ago I took a lone-horse back ride upon the old Cumberland road for a number of miles for the purpose of refeshing early recollections of that old highway, which was commonly, but not correctly called the National road or Pike no doubt because the national treasury furnished all the money or means to build it.

I propose in this paper to give an authentic and accurate history in a suitable form and space of this old historic highway. Every person who knows something of the Braddock's old road that it was hastily made from Cumberland over the Allegany mountains in 1755 by Genneral Braddock as a military way, in his disastrous expedition to capture Fort Pitt. He however, followed the route or way of Col. Washington with his 120 men, the previous year across the mountains in his unfortunate expedition.

Before these times it was a mere pathway of the Indians, but later used by footmen, and horse men of the white race to reach the frontier regions to traffic with the Indians in their primitive commodities. This now historic road, when it was first made, was insufficient to pass vehicles carrying burdens. Articles of necessity were carried on "packhorses," with tremendous saddles upon them, almost weight enough for a horse to carry. I saw one of the antiquated articles in early days. The sight of one now would be a wonder to enlightened persons. In those early times there was no appropriation of the engineering science in making this road. The Indian pathway was the guide, grades were not thought of or cared, for a way or outlet was the object.

The first public notice of this road was by an act of the Maryland Legislature in 1793, which provided for the straightening and amending the road leading from Uniontown, Pa., to Winding Ridge at the Maryland line. This meant the Braddock Road. The commissioners named in the act were George Dent, grandfather of Mrs. Gen. Grant, Wm. McMahon and Evan Lynn.

The road was not to be over 40 feet wide and the expenses of the improvement was to be paid by the parties asking for it.

As the eastern part of our country increased in population and wealth, its accretions moved to the opposite places over Braddock's road, and in time it became the most important thoroughfare in the country to the inviting West. Its now dim lines in places can still be identified, but upon general view it is not visible. Full grown trees now stand in its track in many places where years ago trenches existed. The obliterated road was entirely abandoned as a thoroughfare nearly a century since; and every tavern and building that once lined it at least in Maryland has entirely disappeared. The Tomlinson Inn, the most noted of all, was ruthlessly torn down, fifty years ago, and afterwards the ground made a truck patch. In this famous house a splendid family was reared, all passed away long since, with but few descendents.

After the organization of the general government in 1789, the tides from the East to the West, mainly over this way, increased rapidly, so much so that it became worn out and utterly inadequate as the public artery and was the first to receive national treatment. As early as 1806, the year of the advent of Henry Clay to the U. S. Senate, Congress saw, and acted on the necessity of making internal improvements. This year the sum of $30,000 was appropriated to open and make the Cumberland road to the Ohio river.

From this time its legal name was Cumberland road. In 1810, $60,000 were appropriated to be spent between Cumberland and Brownsville, Pa. In 1811 $50,000 were appropriated to be spent between Cumberland and Brownsville, Pa. In 1813 $50,000 were appropriated to be applied between these two places: in 1815, $30,000 in the same manner; in 1818 the sum of $52,984, and $260,000 for the Cumberland road, generally. In 1820, $10,000 were appropriated preliminary to the extensiou of the road West of Wheeling. In 1823 $250,000 appropriated for the road between Cumberland and Wheeling.

This law for the first time authorized a superintendent to be appointed by the President. David Shriver, of Cumberland, was appointed. In 1825 $150,000 were appropriated to be spent between Canton and Zanesville, Ohio; in 1827, $30,000 between Cumberland and Wheeling; in 1829 $100,000 to extend the road beyond Zanesville, Ohio; in 1831, the aggregate sum of $244,915.85 was appropriated for the road in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois; in 1832, $150,000 to be used east of the Ohio river. The act of Congress of 1833, Chapter 79, is the assent to the act of Virginia, to take control of the part of the road in that State. The act of 1834 appropriated $450,000 to be applied in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and $300,000 east of the Ohio river. In 1835 $200,000 in Ohio; $100,000 in Indiana, and $346,186.58 for the road east of the Ohio river. This was the last appropriation of money for the road East of the Ohio.

In 1836 $200,000 were given to Ohio's part; $250,000 to Indiana, and $50,000 to Illinois. In 1837 $190,000 were appropriated for the road in Ohio, and $100,000 to Indiana and Illinois each. And in 1838 $150,000 for the road to be used in each of these then rising States.

Here Congress seemed to have tied up its purse, and never to have opened it again for the Cumberland road.

All these appropriations spent east of the Ohio, came from the general funds of the government, but the monies applied to the road in the States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, came entirely from the sales of public lands in these States. The whole amount of money, appropriated by Congress, and expended upon the Cumberland road amounted to the sum of $4,284,086,41. A large aggregate of these early times. These many appropriations covered a space of about 32 years. In all these years there was opposition to the appropriations upon the grounds that the constitution did not authorize Congress to favor internal improvements.

At least one of the appropriations was vetoed by President Monroe. President Jackson vetoed the Maysville road bill upon the same grounds. The Cumberland road was not strictly parallel with Braddock's but they were very close to each other, crossing each other at sharp angles in several places, and never over one-fourth of a mile apart west of Cumberland. Really Braddock's route or road commenced at Alexandria, Va., but continued on the Virginia side to a point near Cumberland, but the Virginia part never seemed to have much notice or history.

BLUE BELLE.

SWANTON.

Rev. Geo. C. Shaw, of South Cumberland, will hold a service at 7:30 o'clock Friday evening, Dec. 13th, in Anderson Chapel, Swanton.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Mosser lost their infant of about six months of age, Saturday evening, December 7th, 1907. The parents had taken their sick child to the Keyser hospital for treatment but it was too prostrated for the requisite treatment and died on the train before reaching Swanton.

Mrs. Daniel Mosser, of Swanton, is dangerously ill and serious apprehensions are entertained as to her recovery.

Mr. Arch Barnard has gotten the machinery of the Swanton gristmill in motion and is making first class buckwheat floor.

FROM ANOTHER CORRESPONDENT.

Mr. Archibald Barnard, who purchased the Swanton Flour Mill about two months since, started the same in operation last Thursday, after it had been idle for several years. Mr. Barnard has made extensive improvements in the mill by putting a thirty-two horse power engine and a complete roller process of the latest and most improved type. Mr. Luther Jackson, of the Romney (W. Va.) Roller Mills, is now in charge while Mr. E. N. Jackson will soon be installed as the miller. This means good work. Mr. Barnard is an honest and progressive young man and we wish him great success in his new enterprise.

The Methodist Episcopal Sunday school, which is among the up-to-date and progressive schools of the county, will render a fine program on the night of Dec. 24th. Prof. I. F. Groves is in charge of the musical part of the entertainment. A full notice of this service will be given later. A good time can be expected.

Mr. Geo. H. Rodeheaver is succeeding nicely as the teacher of the Painter public school.

The Methodist Episcopal church has been improved by the addition of two nice chandeliers.

COME IN AND GET ACQUAINTED

A LARGE ORDER COMPLETED.

Printed Matter From The Republican Office Shipped to India and Other Foreign Countries.

Probably the first order for printed matter ever shipped to a foreign country from this section, was recently forwarded to Calcutta, India, from the job printing department of THE REPUBLICAN, it being a portion of an order executed for Rev. D. H. and Mrs. Ada Lee, managers of the Lee Memorial Bengali Mission, located at Calcutta, of which Mrs. Fannie L. Sherry, of Mountain Lake Park, is the home secretary.

The entire order embraced ten thousand calendars, requiring over twelve hundred pounds of cardboard; twenty thousand letter sheets and a case of heavy manila mailing envelopes, in which to enclose the calendars for mailing to individuals.

The secretary of the Mission shipped from her home at the Park direct to parties in England and Scotland large numbers of the calendars and several hundred were sent to missionary workers in New England and other sections of the United States.

Rev. and Mrs. Lee, who sailed on October 5th from New York for Calcutta, being accompanied by three young ladies and two young gentlemen who will become missionaries in India, expected to reach their destination on last Thursday—Thanksgiving Day.

In Calcutta the Mission which Rev. and Mrs. Lee manage is composed of a number of buildings, including a home for girls, a hospital and workship for boys, a training school and a hospital, the entire value of the holdings being about $80,000, which is vested in a board of trustees. A new building, known as the Memorial Building, is in course of completion, and will stand in memory of the six children of Rev. and Mrs. Lee, who were killed in a landslide at Darjeeling, India, in October, 1899.

Mr. Leo J. Rasche, formerly of this office, is doing special newspaper reporting for the Grafton Daily Sentinel and other papers of that section of West Virginia. Mr. Rasche's write-up of the mine explosion at Monongah, published in Saturday's issue of the Sentinel, was by far the best account of the awful catastrophe appearing in any of the dailies up to that time.

The finest Coffee Substitute ever made has recently been produced by Dr. Shoop of Racine, Wis. You don't have to boil it twenty or thirty minutes. "Made in a minute," says the doctor. "Health Coffee" is really the closest Coffee Imitation ever yet produced. Not a grain of real Coffee in it either. Health Coffee Imitation is made from pure toasted cereals or grains, with malt, nuts, etc. Really it would fool an expert—were he to unknowingly drink it for Coffee. Sold by all dealers.

Sheriff A. L. Lee, who recently purchased the Kitzmiller hotel at Kitzmillerville, is making preparations to move to that point as soon as he turns his office over to his recently elected successor, Mr. Austin Brown, which will probably be the latter part of this or the first of next week. Mr. Lee and his estimable wife have made many friends in Oakland during their two years' stay in the countyseat, many of whom noped they would remain permanent residents of the city. The best wishes of our citizens accompany them, however, to their new place of abode. Mr. Brown and his family will take possession of the sheriff's residence immediately after Sheriff Lee vacates.

One of our good farmers was telling on the streets yesterday a conversation he chaaced to hear between a young boy in his teens and a Christian Scientist. It appears the Scientist came across a small boy sitting under an apple tree doubled up with pain. "My little man," he said, "what is the matter?" "I ate some green apples," moaned the boy, "and, ah, how I ache!" Answered the follower of Mrs. Eddy, "you only think so." The boy looked up in astonishment at such a statement, and then replied in a most positive manner: "That's all right: you may think so, but I've got inside information."

Miss Tekla Johnson entertained a number of friends at her home in Oakland on last Friday evening at a hunting party. The hostess provided each of her guests with a guide and armed with a formidable weapon they went on a hunting expedition through the house for the ferocious and untamable "Teddy Bears," the hunter succeeding in capturing the greatest number being awarded a handsome prize and the less fortunate one secured a prize of less value. The guides were the ladies and they, of course, were responsible to a more or less degree for the success of the hunters. The first prize was awarded to Mr. W. O. Davis, who had as his guide Miss Corinne Manges and the booby prize to Mr. Fred Furbee with Miss Anna Manges for his guide. Other games were played during the evening for which prizes were given. At a seasonable hour delicious refreshments were served after which the guests took their departure thanking their hostess for a most delightful time. The other guests present were Misses Catharine Manges, Nell Sturgiss, Alice and Elizabeth Hart; Messrs. Stuart F. Hamill, A. Totten Matthews, Albert W. Clary, George Weber and Prof. L. Bassett.

GRAND JURY REPORT.

Body Adjourned Friday Morning, After a Session of Five Days.

The grand jury adjourned Friday morning after having made the following report to the court:

To the Honorable, the Judges of the Circuit Court for Garrett county.

The Grand Jury for the December term of said Garrett county having to the best of their ability performed the duties devolving upon us as members of this body, we now desire to report our proceedings and receive our discharge.

In the performance of the trust reposed in us we have endeavored to do so without fear or favor in accordance with the oath that was administered to us and the charge your Honor delivered in our presence in committing these matters to our consideration and judgment.

We have found presentments in all cases in which we believe the evidence justifies and have ignored trivial cases and cases in which the evidence did not appear to warrant a presentment.

In our deliberations we have examined one hundred and thirty-eight witnesses and have found twenty-eight true bills of indictment.

With but two exceptions there has been no crimes of a very serious nature committed in this county since the last term of court, and upon a careful examination we find that there has been less violation of the liquor law than usual, and we believe that the majority of the dealers throughout the county are endeavoring to obey the law in this respect.

As required by law we have inspected the records and visited the public buildings and are pleased to be able to report that the records are in as good condition as their present quarters will permit, and the county is to be congratulated on having such a careful and proficient officer as Mr. Tower in looking after the same.

We deem it unnecessary to recommend any change or improvement to the old court house, as we think it will serve the purpose in its present condition until the new court house is completed. We are glad to note that the new court house is under construction and the work, so far as it has progressed, is done in a substantial and satisfactory manner.

The county is to be congratulated in having a sheriff who takes such an interest in seeing that the jail and sheriff's residence are kept in such good condition. As far as we can see there is no suggestion that we could offer.

We desire to acknowledge the kindness and courtesy received by us from your Honor and all of the officials of the county with whom our labors brought us in contact, and we especially desire to express our appreciation of the valuable aid and assistance of the State's Attorney, Mr. Thayer, and we wish to personally thank him for the assistance rendered us in the course of our investigations which materially aided us in the discharge of our duties.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

Dormitory 10.

By TEMPLE BAILEY.

Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.

Betty Belle, coming in that morning from "English two," found on the table in her room in the dormitory a cocoanut cake, a plate of chicken sandwiches and a card. The card read. "Compliments of Prudence Conway."

Prudence was the colored maid on the third floor of dormitory 10 of the summer school. To be chosen as a pet by Prudence meant many privileges. To the girl she liked she brought unlimited towels, while some less favored maiden might languish with two a week, and now in providing Betty Belle with materials for a midnight spread Prudence showed evidence of high regard.

Betty Belle was from the south, hence her name. There had been two aunts beloved by her mother, and the little girl had been called after them always. Betty Belle wondered why the northern girls thought it funny.

"Well, we don't string ours together that way, as a rule," Drusilla Davis told her. "And I don't believe we place such value on names. But you are a dear, Betty Belle, only you are different."

"How different?" Betty Belle questioned, and Drusilla laughed:

"Oh, you are so old fashioned and pretty and serious."

Betty Belle blushed. "You are pretty, too, Drusilla."

Drusilla shook her head. "Not in the fascinating way that you are, Betty Belle."

The scholars of the summer school ate at an adjoining boarding house, and at the lunch table that day Betty Belle told about the chicken sandwiches and the cocoanut cake.

There were four men at the table besides the girls. As Betty Belle described the deliciousness the men groaned enviously.

"And we don't come in for any of that?" asked Dick Chase, who had flunked in his studies the winter before and was making up during the summer term. His father was worth a million, and it was hard for Dick to understand why he needed to grind over books.

"I THINK WE COULD BE GOOD FRIENDS IF YOU WOULD PULL UP."

"No," Betty Belle told him; "no men are allowed above the first floor of our dormitory."

"Well, we will serenade you while you are eating it," Dick said.

"Please don't," Betty begged.

"Why not?" Dick asked in surprise. His attentions had always been sought rather than refused, and he had meant that Betty Belle should appreciate the high honor he was conferring.

"It's against the rules," Betty Belle said.

"I shouldn't think you would mind a little thing like that."

"I don't," said Betty Belle, "but you can't afford to lose any standing."

He flushed. "You needn't hit a fellow when he's down. I don't care whether I get through next year or not."

"Well, I do," said little Betty Belle. "You told me about your mother, and I don't think you ought to disappoint her."

Dick's eyes dropped before the clear ones of the little southern girl.

"I shouldn't like to disappoint her," he murmured.

But that night as six girls in all the comfort of dainty kimonos and dressing sacks ate cocoanut cake and chicken sandwiches with ginger ale accompaniment there floated up through the air the strains of "Dixie."

"There," said Drusilla Davis; "that is in your honor, Betty Belle."

Betty, pink and white and charming in her rosy kimono, tapped a small foot impatiently.

"Well, I wish he wouldn't," she said.

Margaret Mills looked at her with raised eyebrows. "Why, Betty Belle Fairfax," she exclaimed, "he is worth a million! Any girl would be glad to have him pay her attention."

"I don't care if he is worth ten millions," Betty Belle returned quickly; "he isn't a gentleman."

The girls looked at her, startled. "Why, Betty Belle," one gasped, "what makes you say such a thing?"

"He isn't," affirmed Betty Belle, with her head held high. "The gentlemen at my home have consideration for the wishes of ladies, and I told him not to sing. And he has an invalid mother who is just praying for his success, and he is wasting his time. It isn't right; it isn't right!" And Betty Belle clapped both hands over her ears to shut out the strains of "Dixie."

"Some one will tell Dick Chase what you said about him," Drusilla told the small maiden after the other girls had gone to their rooms.

"I don't care," said Betty Belle hotly, but when Drusilla went away she got down at the window and looked out for a long time upon the moon lighted campus.

Then she rose and took the one piece of cocoanut cake that was left and wrapped it up in a dainty parcel and tied it with ribbon, and in the morning she sent it by Prudence to Dick Chase, with a little note.

"I said things about you last night," was the confession he read in her clear cut writing. "I said you were not a gentleman. Some one may tell you, and I shouldn't like to have you hear it that way. But I didn't think you were courteous to disregard my wishes, and I worried about your mother. I know you won't forgive me, but I had to explain."

At noon on the campus Dick Chase came up to Betty Belle.

"It was right—what you said," he told her soberly. "I've been a fearful cad, and I needed a good jolt."

Betty Belle sat down on a seat under the elms. "You see, I have lots of brothers," she confided, "and I know how mothers feel about their boys—and, then, I couldn't bear to see you going to the bad."

There was a little tremble in her voice, and Dick looked up quickly. "Do you care?" he asked eagerly.

"Yes," Betty Belle told him without coquetry. "I think we could be good friends if you would pull up."

Dick flung himself down on the bench beside her. "I would have to be more than friends, Betty Belle," he said. "I—have grown to think a lot of you; you are so—different."

"That's what Drusilla says," Betty Belle remarker, "and I don't just see what you all mean."

"Well, you are so good and true, little Betty Belle. You make a fellow feel that life is worth while."

That night in dormitory 10 Betty Belle made a confession.

"I am sorry that I said such things about Dick Chase." They were sitting in the dark, and the other girls could not see her blushes. "I was in a bit of a temper, you know."

"Southern blood?" commented Margaret Mills.

"Maybe," said Betty Belle.

Across the campus they could see the lights in the men's dormitory. In one room a crowd of boys had gathered around a piano, and their voices floated out in a rollicking college song. In another room a lamp with a green shade made a halo around a man's bent head.

"Why, I believe Dick Chase is studying," said Drusilla Davis. "What is going to happen?"

"He is going to turn over a new leaf," said Betty Belle demurely.

Something in her voice made the girls ask in a chorus, "How do you know?"

"Because I am engaged to him," said Betty Belle.

Shadow Sketches.

Nature was the first artist, and a shadow sketch was the first picture made. She is still spreading her beautiful designs wherever a beautiful object stands in the sunlight, and we are about to learn what she can teach us of her method. In going along country roads and paths have you not admired the shadows that the flowers and all graceful plants cast on the ground? Those of leaves and vines actually display the outlines of the plants to even better advantage than can be seen in the objects themselves, because shadows have no perspective and no shading. An easy way to arrange a vase of flowers or of leafy twigs for drawing is to study their shadow on a wall while the vase is slowly turned until the shadow shows them to be suitably placed.

As a rule objects like large leaves and birds' nests are best for simple outlining, while delicate and complicated shadows like those cast by vines and by most flowers are best for the blackened surface of the silhouette. Shadow outlines make good records of flowers and plants if accompanied by the usual notes on color and habit. —St. Nicholas.

A "Peach" of a War Story.

Humor is not associated with the bloody days of Kentucky in Revolutionary times. But a bit of fun of the grewsome kind is recited by Lynn Tew Sprague in the Outing Magazine in an article entitled "General Isaac Shelby, First Governor of Kentucky." The incident follows:

"A patriot soldier of the neighborhood named Culbertson, who subsequently became a captain, was at the time acting as a scout to Shelby's command, and while gathering information before the action he came suddenly upon a British dragoon, far from support, who was eating a peach. Both were startled by the meeting, and the Britisher swallowed the fruit, stone and all, and reached for his gun. A shooting match ensued. The dragoon perished in the duel and was hastily buried by the scout in a shallow hole. Visiting the grave next year, Culbertson found a peach tree growing from it, and he boasted of living to enjoy fruit rooted in British soil and fertilized by his adversary. The story, we may add, is Culbertson's very own, but who shall say that the patriot army lacked constructive imagination?"

WOMEN WHO WENT TO WAR.

Devoted Wives Who Could Not Bear Separation from Husbands.

The women of America had their full share of the burdens of war when they gave their husbands, sons and brothers to the country which called upon them in dire need. It is conceded that of the two, the woman who stayed at home and the man who marched away, the woman had the harder task.

But the records of the war department show that women were not, in all cases, willing to remain at home, parted from those they loved. Strange stories, writes Ada C. Sweet, in Chicago Journal, are told, some of them well authenticated, of girls who enlisted as men and maintained their disguise for a longer time than would be imagined possible.

She Saw Her Husband Shot Dead by Her Side.

Love of one man, rather than love of country, was the ruling passion with most of the war-going women. But there were exceptions, apparently, one of which I shall describe.

It was easy, especially after the first two years, for a woman to pass the careless inspection of recruiting officers who were mainly anxious to fill their lists regardless of the fitness of the volunteers as fighters. That they were "food for powder" was thought to be enough. If the new recruit came somewhere near five feet in height, and was not obviously lame, halt or blind, admission to the ranks was sure.

Annie Dillybridge, a 16-year-old girl, enlisted at Detroit, so that she might be near her sweetheart, a lieutenant in the Twenty-first Michigan regiment. To her dismay she was assigned to another company than the one in which her lover was on duty, and though she made every effort to get into his company, she never succeeded. She carried out her duties as a soldier, however, taking part in a number of battles and doing good service.

When, in 1863, she was wounded in the arm, the surgeon who was called to dress the wound discovered her sex, and the young heroine was summarily dismissed from the service and sent home.

"Frank Miller" was the name taken by Frances Hook, a 14-year-old girl who enlisted in Chicago with her brother, early in the civil war. The pair were in one of the "home guard" regiments for three months, and when the term of service was finished they again enlisted, it is said, in the Nineteenth Illinois regiment.

The brother was killed in battle, but the sister remained in her regiment until she was taken prisoner. In attempting to escape from the confederate prison the girl was shot, and her wound led to the discovery of her secret. She was held a prisoner for some weeks, and then exchanged, presumably for a genuine "Johnny Reb," and so she disappeared from the story.

These warlike feminine creatures were, it will be noted, all very young. Mary Owens, a young Pennsylvania girl, but just in her teens, married a young soldier, much against the will of her parents. Fearing to go home after the wedding, she enlisted in her husband's company, declaring that she would never be parted from him. She took the name "John Evans," put on the blue uniform and endured patiently all the hardships of soldier life.

She saw her husband shot dead by her side, and she was wounded in the same battle in which her husband was killed. She was sent home, invalided, after 18 months' service, and her sex remained undiscovered during the whole time of her army experience.

The one girl whose love of war, or of country, seems to have led her to enlist, is an unnamed heroine. I can not help thinking that love led her into the army, although it is not in the story as told by the people who knew her. She was determined to enlist, from the first, but her parents, who lived in New York state, considered her desire to enlist but a crazy notion, and they sent her west to visit some friends, hoping that change of scene and surroundings would bring her to her senses.

But she enlisted, in Detroit, as a drummer, and marched away with her regiment. She kept her secret, and endured the hardships of the march, the camp and the fighting, until she was mortally wounded at the battle of Lookout mountain.

The kind-hearted surgeon who attended her coaxed from her the name of her father and wrote to him of his daughter's position. The identification was complete, but the girl died, almost immediately, in the field hospital—died, as she had lived, alone.

These are a few of the tales of strange happenings; tales which float about in the homes of old men who once wore the blue. Some of them are recorded in the books which make few mistakes as to bald fact, but every one knows that more is left unsaid than can be said, or known, in any history.

FIRST ENLISTED UNION MAN.

Contest for the Honor Between Two Doctors.

A contest for the honor of being the first man to enlist in the army of the north during the civil war has been in progress in congress and in the war department bureaus between William M. De Hart, of Logansport, Ind., and Charles Franklin Rand, of Washington, both doctors. The claims of De Hart have been in the hands of Senator Albert J. Beveridge and Congressman Frederick Landis. His champions have been fighting to gain for the Logansport man an honor that has already been bestowed upon the Washington man by act of congress. They are fighting, writes A. R. Keesling in Leslie's Weekly, to secure for Indiana an honor which they claim has been wrongly appropriated, by act of the legislature at Albany, as a prerogative of the state of New York.

Within an hour after the news of the fall of Fort Sumter had been flashed over the wires, De Hart had enrolled himself, the first, as he believes, of an army that, all told, subsequently consisted of 2,778,304 men. The records of congress and the records of New York state, however, declare Rand to have been the first. These same records also show Rand enlisted two days after De Hart. Documents sent to Washington attest the enlistment of De Hart at nine o'clock, April 13, 1861. The honors Rand has been given were based on official records showing he enlisted April 15 and was mustered in May 13, 1861. Meanwhile, De Hart, according to his supporters, was already on his way to the front, arriving in time to participate in the first battle of the civil war—at Philippi, June 3.

De Hart's documents indicate he enlisted two days before Lincoln's call for 75,000 troops. Rand's claim is simply to have been "the first man to volunteer after Lincoln's call," and this honor awarded him by congress, it is claimed, makes no recognition of several Indiana men who, seeing the nation's peril, volunteered before the call was issued. In Albany's state house Rand's picture is hung, with a record of his history as the first volunteer among the 448,850 men the state sent to the war. Honors have been showered upon Rand by England, Russia, Germany, France, Persia, Mexico, Egypt, India, Norway, and Japan. The war department has given him a large pension; the senate records devote six pages to a tribute to his services; and a lot in Arlington Cemetery, Washington, has been presented to him to shelter his remains when "taps" sounds. De Hart does not seek to disparage one triumph of Rand, but demands recognition as the first volunteer of the northern army.

ULYSSES S. GRANT.

How He Got His Name—A Good Story of His Boyhood.

Ulysses S. Grant received his given name in deference to the wishes of his maternal grandfather, who had a high opinion of the Greek soldier Ulysses, who was distinguished for his wisdom and for his ability to keep silent about affairs of state. Grant made this warrior his model. Grant's mother sometimes joked about his name, saying, "Be careful not to be useless, but try to be Ulysses."

He attended the district school, where he was a fair pupil and noted for his kindly disposition—a trait of character which he inherited from his mother. In after years, one of his early playmates said of him: "I never saw him show any resentment, and I do not believe that he ever felt a tinge of it. He was never rude, oppressive or disagreeable to other children. Once, when he was a very young scholar, he was very much troubled by one of his lessons. A schoolmate, noticing his perplexity, said, 'You can't master that.' Ulysses replied: 'Can't! What does that mean?' 'Why,' replied the boy, 'it means that—that you can't. There!' Ulysses went to the dictionary, and tried unsuccessfully to find the word there. Then he went to his teacher and asked him what was the meaning of the word 'can't,' telling him that he had searched for it in vain in the dictionary. The teacher gave a proper explanation, and added: 'Ulysses, if in the struggles of life any person should assert that you can't do a thing you desire to accomplish, let your answer be, 'The word "can't" is not in the dictionary.'"—Philadelphia Ledger.

No woman legislator in Finland could outdo that French deputy who fainted at the description of bloodshed and had to be carried out of the chamber.

Fate.

A weaver in weaving a woven silken hose,
Was careful to fashion some very cute toes,
But down at the heel, where the things seldom fit,
The weaver, in weaving, he blundered a bit.
The weaver, in weaving a woven silk hose,
At the heel where the shoe always rub-a-dub goes,
Had dropped—(Ah, gad zook, we are now at the hitch!)
Just one little, wee little bit of a stitch!

A maid named McGlade, very gaily arrayed,
Was breaking a man to call love—well, a spade!
She happened to see just the pair of silk hose
The weaver had woven with very cute toes.
She bought what the weaver had woven with care
And, save this one stitch, 'twas a very nice pair.
She carried them home in a sweet, modest way,
For she was as nice as you'd meet any day!

A mouse from the house of Hi Krause did the rest—
He galloped around just a-squeaking his best.
The maid named McGlade got a terrible scare
And shrieking with fright, clambered onto a chair!
And then she permitted—it frightened her so—
A wee little bit of her stocking to show!
But horrors, the sight that she saw 'neath her clothes!
Right there at the heel was a HOLE in her hose!

The weaver in weaving had made a bad hitch
And, just as I've told you, he bungled a stitch.
The man, who was nice and had plenty of rocks,
Deserted his love for a scold with whole socks.
He thought her a slattern, tho' gally arrayed,
And passed from the life of Miss Mabel McGlade!
He took to the habit of drinking bad gin,
While Mabel sobbed long over what might have been!

At last, having waited in vain for her ship,
She married a cuss with a hair-parted lip.
He treated her mean and she left him one day
And strangled herself with a cob, so they say!
The moral is plain: Do your weaving with care
And make stockings safe for a girl on a chair.
If weaving, a weaver of woven silk hose,
Be careful of heels just as well as of toes!

A Few Well Chosen Remarks.

Don't be too hard on the criminal who is caught in a repetition of his crime. Frequently, well-meaning people marry twice.

There is only the difference of an "a" between an idle and an ideal husband.

Remember, that every Christmas present bought now, saves worry and cash during the last mad rush under the wire.

Don't forget to fatten a turkey for the editor!

Many a man has gone to bed with the gas turned on and suffered no further injury than that done his pocket book.

It would be impossible to get in on the ground floor of a flying machine project.

More people would toboggan if they had energy enough to get to the top.

Be kind to your neighbors and they will borrow your nice fresh eggs.

Sometimes tramps are welcomed by the newly married housewife. Somebody has to eat the sponge cake!

The handles on the coffin of the man who talked about a mule behind its back, cost $3.10.

Speaking to a girl always did cost money. If it is in Chicago and you don't know her, the policeman "will get you if you don't watch out." On the other hand, marriage licenses are no cheaper now than formerly, so far as I know.

There is no hope for the fool that is always right.

It is almost a year now since Tom Browne, the English cartoonist, returned to England after asserting that he wouldn't spend another winter in Chicago for $50,000. It is not unseasonable or untoward, at this time, to remark that I haven't heard of anyone offering Tom that amount to come back.

Amenities.

Our amiable contemporary let loose a yawp last week about the return of Ike Winslow. The Journal don't intend to pay much attention to this said contemporary, but we stop adding new subscribers long enough to say that Ike has for sure returned. We were keeping him safe from the prying eyes of those who are unable to find much more than half the news the Journal is printing every day, until today, when he called on his wife and made an effort to effect a reconciliation. Mrs. Winslow, we are informed, refused to have anything more to do with him.—Orton (Mich.) Journal.

Respect.

No matter how small he is,
A man should a short maid woo,
For when you are tied for good,
She'll always look up to you!

Sick of Bilious.

Ye editor was sick of bilious for three days.—Horton (Neb.) Echo.

Stop That Cold

To check early colds or Grippe with "Preventics" means sure defeat for Pneumonia. To stop a cold with Preventics is safer than to let it run and be obliged to cure it afterwards. To be sure, Preventics will cure even a deeply seated cold, but taken early—at the sneeze stage—they break, or head off these early colds. That's surely better. That's why they are called Preventics.

Preventics are little Candy Cold Cures. No Quinine, no physic, nothing sickening. Nice for the children—and thoroughly safe too. If you feel chilly, if you sneeze, if you ache all over, think of Preventics. Promptness may also save half your usual sickness. And don't forget your child, if there is feverishness, night or day. Herein probably lies Preventics' greatest efficiency. Sold in 5c boxes for the pocket, also in 25c boxes of 48 Preventics. Insist on your druggists giving you

Vacations Necessary to High-Pressure Business

By CAPT. R. G. F. CANDAGE, Marine Surveyor.

FIFTY or more years ago our fathers labored from dawn to dusk, in many employments, to gain a livelihood and to accomplish what can now be better done in half the time, and day are in active business frequently until they reach threescore and ten, and even fourscore.

In that earlier period there were few labor-saving appliances as compared with the present, such as improved machinery of every kind, factories, railroads, telegraphs, telephones and electrical appliances. Steamships now cross the ocean and circumnavigate the globe in a quarter of the time it took to do it in the old sailing ship, and carry the cargoes and passengers of a dozen of the largest ships dependent upon the wind for propulsion.

These changes have enabled the business man and his employes to concentrate their energies, so as to hurry their goods and wares to and from their shops and warehouses in a quarter of the time formerly needed, first having made arrangements to do so from the counting room or office, through the telegraph or telephone. The electric wires anticipate the arrival of trains, steamships and the mails, and through them cargoes of merchandise are ordered today in China, India, Australia, Europe and the world over, to be sent on their way tomorrow, where formerly months and even years were required.

To keep up in alertness and activity the concentrated efforts caused by the needs of today in business life produces a strain which was unknown to our fathers, and there must be a relaxation and rest, or a breakdown will ensue.

A machine has its limitations, and if kept in constant motion without being stopped for rest, repairs and oilings, it is sure to wear out sooner than under more moderate speed. A human being is in a certain sense a machine of delicate organism, limited to a certain capacity, and if run at high pressure continuously, year in and year out, without rest, relaxation and oiling, will break down in time and cease to be able to turn out the best work, if any.

The stress on brain and mind in business life at the present time is so much greater than in the days of our fathers that it has led to shortening the hours given to business and also to the taking and giving of vacations, which seem to be needful, and are, in my opinion, helpful to the business community, and not detrimental. We have more than enough of nervous breakdowns, even with vacations, and if they were to be withheld I fear we should have many more, to the injury of business and of the general public.

The Well-Managed Husband

By HELEN OLDFIELD.

There are some men who were born to be managed by other people, usually some woman, mother or wife, and from their babyhood a henpecked atmosphere has been the part and portion of their daily lives. All men by no means are able to stand alone. There undeniably are numbers of able men, men of affairs, who in their own homes are figureheads, who pay the bills. But the women who rule in their stead rarely fail in their own persons, still less do they permit any other to fail, in the full payment of all honor and respect to the nominal head of the house. This personage in no sense whatever is a nonentity.

It often happens that men who are noted for their energy and success in business, who are marvels of firmness, not to say obstinacy, in their dealings with other men, are those who are most indulgent, even submissive, to their womenfolk. At home they like to be relieved from all worry and bother, to be made comfortable without the annoyance of seeing the wheels go round. The woman who knows what such a man wants and sees that he has it; who anticipates his wishes; who manages her household without fuss or friction; who never contradicts or nags; who, in short, makes herself essential to his comfort, generally is allowed to have her own way without let or hindrance so long as she takes care (and she usually does) that that way does not cross or conflict with his.

It is an amusing paradox that big men physically, Samson and Hercules, frequently are dominated, openly and candidly, by their wives, who in such cases are little women whom the good humored giants easily could master with one hand. Such a man, with such a wife, reminds the spectator of nothing so much as a big ship in convoy of a little steam tug, puffing and whistling, while the great ship follows in heavy silence. He usually admires his wife for her "smartness" and energy, admits her rule, and makes a joke of it; too thoroughly conscious of his own strength to resent her "bossing."

Young Women Too Dressy

By HETTY GREEN.

Young girls of today are too extravagant. They think too much about clothes, and they don't have enough to do. If they had some useful work to occupy their thoughts they would not run to such extravagance.

I speak from experience. Perhaps you don't know it, but I was quite a bell when I was young. But I outgrew all that sort of thing. These rainbow silks and metal fingers are not to my taste. I used to wear those things. I used to have more fixings and trimmings on me than there is on a Christmas tree. I have more sense now.

Society hasn't enough to do to keep it out of mischief. Those so-called fashionable women spend all their time these days at bridge and smoking cigarettes and drinking pale tea and strong whiskey. Every one of them ought to be down here, working, and they would be better off.

The airs some of those people put on amuse me! Before they got their money some of them made pants for their children out of their husband's old trousers, and now they drive about in their own carriages and hold their noses up in the air as if the dust was too good for them. They do not know how to use their money yet. They are not accustomed to it.

WARFIELD AT WAR WITH ORGANIZATION.

Indications of a Warm Time at Coming Session of The Legislature.

BALTIMORE, Md. December 11.—There will be a hot time in the historic old statehouse at Annapolis next month if Gov. Warfield and the organization leaders in the legislature make good their respective threats. The message to be sent to the lawmaking branch of the state government by Gov. Warfield will not be one calculated to please those who occupy seats in the senate and house. The governor has stated that he intends to "throw on the light" and acquaint the public with certain matters of which it is in ignorance. It is understood that, among other things, he will criticise certain expenditures of the legislature and recommend certnin reforms which, in his judgment, would materially lessen the expenses of a legislative session. Former governors have counseled economy in this particular, but none save Warfield has ever gone to the extent of vetoing an item in the appropriation bill which prevents the employment of any employes other than those specifically named in the bill. The item referred to is the lump sum of $15,000 set apart to defray the expenses of the coming session. Of this sum the amount really vetoed by the governor is $72,000, the appropriation for the various officials of the general assembly being incorporated in separate items.

The fight against the governor, which will open as soon as the message is read will be led by Senator Gorman, whose enmity for Gov. Warfield is not only political, but personal as well. At the present time the "old guard" leaders plan to have introduced as soon as the reading of the message is concluded an appropriation bill making good the deficiency caused by the governor's veto. The temper of the "old guard" regarding Warfield is indeed ugly, and they can be relied upon to embrace every opportunity to make it warm for the governor before he leaves the executive chair. Several senators are busily engaged in storing up ammunition for the coming battle between the governor and the "old guard." They assert that Warfield is not invulnerable and that they will show up the weak spots in his administration. The indications are therefore, that the old order of things will be reversed. As a rule the first month of the session is anything but lively, both houses devoting time to routine matters preparatory to the important legislation to follow, but this session will border on the sensational almost immediately after the general assembly convenes.

That the incoming administration is to be machine from the start is evidenced by the fact that the bosses, under the leadershship of former Gov. Smith, have already fixed up the slate for presiding officers. Of course, the usual party caucus will be held on the evening preceding the opening of the session, but it will be only a farce, as the new boss has picked Gen. Joseph B. Seth of Talbot county to succeed himself as the president of the senate and Delegate J. Enos Ray of Prince George county to be speaker of the house of delegates. The legislature will elect Col. John Walter Smith to the United States Senate for the long term beginning March 4, 1909; Senator Whyte will be elected for the short term ending March 4, 1909, and Murray Vandiver, chairman of the state democratic committee, will be re-elected treasurer of Maryland. The democrats have overwhelming majorities in both branches of the general assembly, and ring measures may be pushed through without a hitch. In the senate there will be 17 democrats, 9 republicans and 1 fusionist; in the house, 71 democrats and 29 republicans; on joint ballot the vote will be: Democrats, 88; republicans, 39; fusionists, 1.

Probably the first act of the new assembly will be to pass a suffrage amendment to be submitted to the people in 1909. The work of drafting this measure is now in the hands of Attorney-General-elect Straus, who will be governed in framing the amendment by the "old guard" leaders. It is understood that an effort will be made to reach an agreement on an amendment similar to the Worthington measure, which met with the approval of Gov Warfield and the independent democrats, but which was rejected by the late Senator Gorman, who favored the Poe Amendment. Of course, the leaders have no fears about the passage by the legislature of any measure they may decide upon, but they fully realize in the light of past experience that the people, the final arbiters of the fate of any amendment, must be reckoned with, and for this reason a special effort will be made to suit all brands of democrats. The impression prevails in some quarters that the election law may be amended so as to provide for majority instead of bipartisan system of election judges.

Aside from the disfranchisement amendment the democrats with a considerable working majority in both branches and a governor in sympathy with them will be able to enact such legislation as they may desire.

One of the most difficult problems that will confront the lawmakers at Annapolis will be the liquor or saloon question sentiment has been growing in this state for years both sides admit, but their are many who doubt that Baltimore can ever be made a "dry" city. The prohibitionists in this city have been gaining votes at each succeeding election until the liquor interests have become thoroughly frightened. That the liquor interests were unable to make any sort of a showing against the present state's attorney, who made a crusrde against them during the past year, has caused much jubilation among the prohibitionists. For the first time in years the wholesalers and retailers united and conducted a joint campaign against those candidates last month who had in the past opposed the saloon. The result of the election in this city was a complete rout for the liquor interests. When the question comes up before the legislature next month the "drys" will present a solid front, while the "wets" will be in a decidedly demoralized condition. There is no gainsaying the fact that the prohibition sentiment is growing in this city and that those who would blot out the saloons are gaining ground each day.

CAUSED BY BREAK IN THE COUPLING

Fractured Iron From Wreck of Runaway Trip Found at Monongah.

FAIRMONT, W. Va., Dec. 18.—One small piece of iron, weighing less than a pound, the fatal coupling pin that attached the cars running out of the death hole known as mine No. 6 was revealed to the sight of a few tonight at Monongah. It is a relic of death. It will exercise its part as an exhibit when the coroner's inquest is held. It will be exhibit A, and upon it depends whether or not the Fairmont Coal Company will have to pay damages to the hundreds of victims of the mine disaster.

That the investigations immediately after the frightful calamity were correct as to the causes leading to it are being varified on every side by mine experts. Personal inspection was made at the entry of mine No. 6 and it was found that there had been a wreck of a load of cars that had been started with heavy loads from the far recesses of the subterranean passages.

Every mine expert that has entered the death holes agrees that dust was the cause of the double explosion that snuffed out the lives of hundreds of miners and boys. Now that both mines have been penetrated for a distance of several thousand feet and no pockets of gas sufficient to cause an explosion of any great extent being encountered the dust theory is regarded as the only plausible one.

The specter coupling pin that broke and allowed the dozen two-ton cars run back into the bowels of the earth, break up all of the great electric system of the company and then the insidious deadly dust and wiped out the lives of hundreds of miners is on exhibition here.

The fatal coupling pin now reposes in the desk in the private office of President Watson of the coal company. It was discovered after a number of bodies had been removed from under the fated cars. It is broken squarely in the middle. The other half has not been recovered.

President Watson exhibited the small piece of iron. It is a staunch piece and broken squarely in the center. He said that he did not care to discuss the causes that lead to the explosion at this time, but will defer until a thorough investigation has been made. Professor F. M. Payne, head of the State School of Mining, and State Geologist, Professor I. C. White, arrived here last night and are making a thorough investigaiion of the mines. They will remain for several days.

Chief State Mine Inspector J. W. Paul, who has been on the ground since the evening of the disaster and who has carefully followed every move of the workmen in and about the mines stated today that he believed that the explosion was caused by an electric spark, due to the smash at the bottom of the slope when the trip of loaded cars broke loose and ran back into the mine. The wreck naturally caused a flurry of coal dust and this, together with the fire generated when the heavily charged feed wires which carry all the current used for working both motors and cutting machine were broken, caused the explosion which swept through both mines.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MATTIE AMELIA THRASHER.

Last Sunday morning, Dec. 8, death entered our town and took away a bright young girl, Mattie Amelia Thrasher, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Thrasher, aged seventeen years, six months and twenty-four days. Two years ago she was afflicted with tuberculosis of the bone. It was found necessary to amputate her limb, but the disease had such a firm hold on her system it could not be arrested. Mattie bore her suffering patiently and never complained of her affliction. When she realized that the end was coming she expressed a wish to lie at rest. For almost her last words were: "There is no suffering in Heaven, and I will soon be there." The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. L. Thomas, assisted by Rev. J. H. Funk, interment in Hamill's cemetery. Those attending the funeral from a distance were Mr. Jos. Thrasher, of Martinsburg, W. Va., Mr. and Mrs. Benj. Thrasher, Mr. and Mrs. Lorenzo Thrasher, Mr. and Mrs. L. Friend, Harley Friend, Robt. Thrasher, Sada Thrasher and Mrs. Jane Sollars of Deer Park, and many others. Misses Blanche and Mary O'Donnell, Jane Wilson, Susie Sharpless, Emma Pritts and Delpha Duling acted as pall bearers. The floral offerings were beautiful. One sister and three brothers survive.

A FRIEND.

FIKE.

We have been having a week of very nice weather for winter as there is some snow but not enough to make sledding as yet.

Mr. P. F. Fike, who moved from this section some weeks ago to Lycenring, Pa., has returned to this place with his family.

Mr. F. J. Bowser was out buying furs one day a short time ago, but he only purchased two skunks.

Mr. Wm. M. Fike sold quite a lot of hay last week.

Mr. Jonas Conner has quit working for F. T. Fike and it is said he is working in a coal mine for U. G. Savage.

The school of this place is progressing nicely so far as we can learn.

SHERIFF BROWN IN CHARGE.

Recently Elected Official Took Charge of Office Tuesday Afternoon.

Sheriff Austin Brown, who was elected last month to succeed Mr. Albert L. Lee, who has served the public faithfully and well for the past two years as Sheriff, was sworn into office Tuesday afternoon by Clerk to the Circuit Court E. Z. Tower and immediately assumed the duties of the office, relieving Mr. Lee, who vacated the sheriff's residence yesterday, Mr. Brown moving his household effects from his residence on Second street to the sheriff's house the same day. In taking charge of the office Mr. Brown does so with a full knowledge of the duties devolving upon him, he having been sheriff a number of years ago, when he conducted the affairs of the office faithfully and conscientiously.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee have shipped their goods to Kitzmillerville, this county, where the former has purchased the Kitzmiller hotel which will be thoroughly renovated and fitted up as a first-class stopping place.

BITTINGER.

To the good editor of THE REPUBLICAN and to all its readers, we extend our best wishes for an exceedingly Merry Christmas and a most enjoyable holiday season throughout.

Rev. Alvin Jugel will preach a trial sermon in the Lutheran church at this place on next Sunday morning, Dec. 22nd, at 10 o'clock. He will remain among the people of this charge for a period of three weeks and it is hoped that his services may be secured as a permanent pastor.

Mr. Benjamin Shrock and Miss Susie Orendorf, both of this neighborhood, were married in the Amish church near here on Thursday of last week.

Jonas Bittinger, who has been suffering from an affection of the heart for some weeks, is still confined to the house much of the time.

Mrs. Patterson Engle and grandson, Master Ray, leave this week for Baltimore, where they will spend the roliddays with G. W. Engle and family.

F. M. Bittinger drove over to Kime, Pa., last Sunday, in company with Miss Sadie Sechler and it is rumored that Fred. will shortly embark on the turbulent waters of matrimony.

If your heart would know true gladness,
Feel the throb of Christmas cheer;
Help to lift some load of sadness,
Heal one pain, or dry one tear.

Wasn't Ready For Gabriel.

Jack Parker, an aged and eccentric man at Hayfield, Frederick county, Va., was most scared to death Thursday night by some boys shooting skyrockets. He had never seen them before, and when he saw the strange fire in the sky he thought the world was going to be burned up. He first went out with his shotgun to shoot the angel Gabriel, but when another bunch went high in the air with a great sound and he couldn't see Gabriel he ran to the house and covered up in bed and stayed there till next day after the sun was high. He is a wicked old man and was not prepared for Gabriel's horn.

MUNONGAH, THE STRICKEN WEST VA. CITY, ASKS AID

Governor of West Virginia Heads Appeal Committee.

$50,000 ALREADY SUBSCRIBED

250 Widows and 1,000 Children To Be Provided For—Some Relief To Be Sent Abroad.

FAIRMONT, W. Va., Dec. 15—The permanent relief committee, headed by Gov. W. M. O. Dawson, to provide for the widows and orphans in distress through the recent explosion at the mines of the Fairmont Coal Company, at Monongah, today prepared an appeal for funds that is being sent to chambers of commerce and kindred organizations all over the country.

All newspapers are urged to aid the work by receiving contributions, acknowledging them through their columns and sending them to the treasurer.

Contributions of clothing, toys for the orphans at Christmas time and similar donations are to be sent to W. H. Moore, Mayor of Monongah and chairman of the committe looking after the temporary wants of the victims. The committee's appeal follows:

"At Monongah, W. Va., on Friday, December 6, an explosion in mines of the Fairmont Coal Company resulted in the death of approximately 350 employes.

"Monongah is a mining town of about 3,000 inhabitanta. This disaster has destroyed almost one-half of the breadwinners. The other half is composed of the employes of two other mines of the same company, and of the usual stores, etc., which go to make up purely a mining community.

"Fully 250 widows and 1,000 children are left without any means of support. The most of these families live in company houses at Monongah, the remaining ones in various countries of Europe. The company has generously declared that the families may remain until other provisions is made for them, but operations cannot be resumed at the damaged mines until these houses are available for the new force. Many of the resident families will want to return to their relatives in their native countries in Europe. The other residents' families must seek a community in which they can earn a livelihood.

"Aid must be given these families to reach their new abodes and to help them establish themselves, and the families living abroad must be provided for until they can adjust themselves to their new conditions.

"As near as can be determined at this time about $50,000 from all sources has been subscribed. Upon the basis of $300 for each widow and $100 for each child under 16 years of age $175.000 will be required. At least $25,000 additional will be needed to provide, on relatively the same basis, for the aged dependents of the unmarried victims, the many now unborn children and the undoubted accessions to the married victims' list when complete information has been received.

"The committee feels that a basis lower than the above will not be adequate to properly care for the needs of the bereaved ones, and a total of $200,000 will therefore be required to carry out the relief work on this basis.

"The immediate needs of the resident families are being amply met by the company and a committee of women from Fairmont and Monongah.

"The committee begs to express its profound gratitude for the contributions already so generously made and to earnestly appeal for the further assistance that it feels is so badly needed.

"The magnitude of this disaster is too great for West Virginia to alone render all the help required. It commands national attention, and the committee feels assured that its appeal will be heard and responded to by the nation.

"All checks should be made payable to the Monogah mines relief committee, J. E. Sands, treasurer, Fairmont, W. Va.

A SUDDEN DEATH.

John B. Friend, of Near Swanton, Died at His Home Thursday.

The news of the death of John B. Friend, one of the best know citizens of Swanton District, came as a distinct shock to his many friends and acquaintances last Thursday evening at a late hour, his demise having occurred that evening while seated at the table at his home partaking of the evening meal.

Mr. Friend had been a juror at the recent term of the Circuit Court held in Oakland, receiving his discharge from further service on Thursday morning along with the rest of the jurors. He returned to Swanton Thursday afternoon on the accommodation train and walked from the station there in company with Mr. A. F. George, to the latter's home, and proceeded to his domicile alone, which is located a short distance beyond that of Mr. George's, arriving there about seven o'clock, when he started to partake of his supper with the members of his family. While thus engaged he was stricken with heart failure and died within a very few moments, and before aid could be summoned by the members of his household.

Mr. Friend was an excellent citizen, a farmer by occupation and highly esteemed by all who knew him.

Mr. Friend was born within one-half mile of where he died, on Jan. 22, 1849. Mr. Friend was united in marriage with Miss Harriet Comp in January, 1871. To this union nine sons and seven daughters were born. Mrs. Friend and seven sons and six daughters survive him, all of whom were present at the funeral. One son, George W., who was a former Garrett county school teacher but who is now connected with the U. S. Recruiting office at Toledo, Ohio, came from that place to attend the funeral. The funeral sermon was preached in in the Methodist Episcopal Church on Sunday morning, by Rev. Albert Engle.

Swanton Grange No. 194, attended in a body and had charge of the services. The beautiful and impressive burial service of the Grange was used at the grave. The pall bearers were Thomas A. McRobie, Theo. George, Calvin H. Glotfelty, James P. Fitzwater, Geo. G. Lee and Henry Johnson.

The last work of Mr. Friend was in the service of his native county, as stated above, serving as a juryman only being discharged on the day of his death and how sudden the summons. With the poet it can be said "God's finger touch him and he slept."

The bereaved family have the sympathy of the entire community.

ROOSEVELT DECLARES HE IS NOT IN RACE

Announcement Leaves No Doubt He Is Not a Presidential Candidate.

ROOSEVELT RESPECTS PRECEDENT

He Reiterates His Statement Made on the Night of Election and Says Most Positively That He Will Not Change His Mind.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 12.—President Roosevelt will not be a candidate for a third term. All doubt on this point was dispelled by the authoritative statement from the White House last Thursday that Mr. Roosevelt still adheres to the declaration of renunciation made on the night of the election three years ago. In the statement issued President Roosevelt says he has not changed and shall not change the decision communicated to the American people in 1904.

It appears that the President had been awaiting the call for the Republican National Convention to afford the proper opportunity for making his position clear and unmistakable, thus leaving the field clear for Fairbanks, Taft, Cannon, Knox, Foraker and other declared or receptive candidates for the Republican nomination.

The President's statement follows:

On the night after election I made the following announcement: "I am deeply sensible for the honor done me by the American people in thus expressing their confidence in what I have done and have tried to do. I appreciate to the full the solemn responsibility this confidence imposes upon me, and I shall do all that in my power lies not to forfeit it. On the fourth of March next I shall have served three and a half years, and this three and a half years constitute my first term. The wise custom which limits the President to two terms regards the substance and not the form, and under no circumstances will I be a candidate for or accept another nomination."

"I have not changed and shall not change the decision thus announced."

The announcement that the President would not accept the Republican nomination, if tendered, came at too late an hour to become generally known in political circles, but among those who learned of it, Democrats and Republicans alike, the feeling was general that it left no element of doubt in the Presidential situation, so far as relates to the third term talk, and that it definitely eliminates Mr. Roosevelt from the contest now being waged. Some Democrats, however, expressed a belief that a Roosevelt stampede in the Republican Convention would shake his resolution, and that he would prove no exception to the historic precedent that no American citizen ever refused a Presidential nomination.

Administration Republicans declare that the announcement gives a great impetus on the Taft boom, while the Democrats, many of the leaders of which party are here to attend the meeting of their National committee today, are shouting that it means "Bryan in a walk."

Speaker Cannon, when shown the President's statement said:

"The President speaks for himself. It would be useless and inappropriate for me to attempt to interpret the President's words."

Senator Foraker, the only other declared candidate who could be seen said:

"That has been his position all the while, I suppose, but I don't care to discuss the matter, thank you."

The National Anthem.

Washingtonians who attend band concerts are rapidly adopting the foreign custom of arising and uncovering the heads when national airs are played. "The Star Spangled Banner" especially evokes the mark of respect, and a salute to the flag accompanies other patriotic demonstrations. At the beginning of the season of band concerts very few people troubled themselves to observe the custom, and those few were either soldiers or former members of military organizations in which the salute is required. The lack of respect received unfavorable notice, and Lieut. Santelmann, director of the United States Marine Band, more than once expressed regret that the crowds at the concerts failed to attest their patriotic sentiment when the national anthem was played. It was said by the director of the band that Americans prided themselves upon being the most patriotic people on earth, and had as a common expression, "Insult the flag and you insult each of us," yet when they had an opportunity to show respect for that flag they let it slip by. Foreigners also have made slighting remarks about the attitude of the Americans when their national airs were rendered, and looked on in surprise when "The Star Spangled Banner" was played before the crowd sitting or lounging around on the ground apparently listless. But during the past summer hundreds of foreigners have frequented the city, and the soldiers from the marine barracks and Fort Myer, Va., who are very much in evidence at the concerts, have taught the plain American citizens respect for the colors. Their teachings have had the effect which Lieut. Santelmann has longed desired. When the first strains of the anthem are begun the soldiers are first to leap to their feet, but civilians follow immediately. Of course some salute with as much ease and grace as to make it impossible for the observer to distinguish the former soldiers from these who have never been nearer battle more real than those put on by the moving-picture shows. Army and Navy Life.

IN ONE MINER'S HOME.

This morning I visited the home of James Flaherty, who was killed in the explosion. In the small, unpainted shanty which he called home Flaherty left a widow and five small children, stair-stepping from 10 years old down to a baby in arms. The oldest child scarcely understood the nature of the disaster that had fallen upon them. The younger ones gazed in round-eyed astonishment at the unwonted sight of a visitor.

It was as sordid a home as one could imagine, but no doubt Flaherty loved it well. It was neat and tidy, but filled with the unutterable pathos of poverty. A pair of heavy miner's boots, run down at the heels, stood in one corner. An old safety lamp was on the mantel, together with a cracked glass vase and a clock that ticked rheumatically.

Through an open door could be seen an ancient fireless stove and a bed swathed in a drapery of ragged quilts. The floors were bare and cheerless, the entire atmosphere of the place dismal and empty and full of gloom.

On the wall were mottoes woven in colored yarn on cardboard. One was "God Love Us." and the other the simple and ancient plea, "God Bless Our Home."

The widow stood in the middle of the room with her thin infant in her arms. It whined weakly and drooled on its mother's breast. She gave no heed to it.

"Have you heard anything?" she asked abruptly. I told her I had not.

"Oh!" she continued, "I thought you were from the coal company. They are sending men around."

Then she wiped off a chair with her dress skirt and asked me to sit down. "Yes, my man is in there with the others," she continued, apathetically. "I have given up hopes of ever seeing him again. There is no use in crying. I have cried until I cannot cry any more, and it only worries the children. I will have to look after them somehow, and I don't know how I am ever going to do it. I could support myself before me and James was married, but now, you see, I have five others to care for. But maybe the company will give me some work. They were good to James."

Then her limited thoughts took a sudden turn.

"Poor James!" she whispered, her thin lips trembled in her effort to suppress her tears. "He is without coffin or shroud or the priest, in there. And I never kissed him goodbye that morning, but I remember that he waved his hand at me and the children. That was the last I saw of him, and I don't think I will ever see him again."

I could not reassure her; she was only one of 200 women with the same grief, the same heartache.—Langdon Smith in New York American.

A GREAT RELIGIOUS FEAST

Being Celebrated For 374th Time By Pious Mexicans.

For the 374th time the feast of the Virgin of Guadalupe, the greatest festival in the Mexican religious calendar, was celebrated at the city of Mexico on Thursday. Special excursions on all railroads brought thousands of pious pilgrims from all parts of the republic, and it is estimated that before the day was over not less than 50,000 devotees paid visits to the shrine in the famous church at the villa de Guadalupe, just outside the city. In every city throughout the country, and in all the villages and rural communities, similar devotion was paid to the memory of Mexico's patron saint. Since the passage of the reform laws, marking the absolute separation of church and State in Mexico, the president and the government officials no longer take any part in the celebration, but its observance is none the less enthusiastic on the part of the populace.

For days preparations for the festival went forward and, as usual they illustrate that curious mixture of piety and worldiness that is a trait of the Mexicans. No other country in the world promises such a medley of devotion and barbarism in the observance of its national festival. Prayers and devotional exercises, while an important part of the day's programme, by no means satisfy the enthusiasm of the pilgrims who come to pay their respects to Nuestra Senora de Guadalupe. Games of chance flourish, and the most pious peon, after satisfying the demands of the church by dipping his fingers in the holy water, crossing himself and uttering a prayer, hastens back to the gaming table or the cock pit, supremely unconcious that his actions are in the least paradoxial or incongruous.

In booths located at advantageous positions near the shrine are sold the tamales, the chili con carne and the other curious concoctions of food so dear to the Mexican taste, while at other booths liquid refreshments of an exceedingly maddening character are dispensed. The tourist who visits the scene of the festivities is able to buy, at a price not more than a dozen times that which a native would have to pay, the marvelous articles for personal adornment, novel specimens of Indian handiwork, pottery and other bric-a-brac peculiar to Mexican curiosity shops. The merry-go-round furnished amusement for thousands of Mexicans, clad in serapes of many colors and crowned with immense sombreros, and the gay sight is not less amusing and novel for the visitor who sees it for the first time. Indian dances, barbarous performances accompanied by the weird, wild music of Indian instruments, are a feature of the celebration and give a touch of savagery to the scene. The dancers were attired in fantastic costumes and chant the dolorous ditties handed down to them by their forefathers, in honor of the Virgin of Guadalupe. The crack of firecrakers and the drunken babbling of revellers who have drank more than is good for them was heard on every side. A great display of fireworks closed the festivities.

In accordance with the usual custom on Guadalupe day, a picture of the Virgin is displayed in front of nearly every home in Mexico, whether that home be the palace of a Spanish grandee, the hovel of a peon or the hut of an Indian.

According to tradition, it was in 1531, ten years after the conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards, that the Virgin Mary appeared to an Indian on the spot where the famous church now stands and commanded him to build an edifice to her honor on the site. This Indian was Juan Diego. It was on December 12 that he received his mission, which he proved to the bishop by showing him his blanket, on which had been miraculously imprinted an image of the Virgin.

This Blanket, bearing the miraculous image, is still preserved in the church of Guadalupe. Money and costly jewels aggregating in value many millions of dollars have been given for its adornment, and it now lies in a frame of solid gold, covered a crystal plate, above the altar of the church which was erected by command of the Virgin. On each side of the image, within the golden frame, are strips of gold in which glitter and flash myriad diamonds, emeralds, pearls and other precious stones.

Despite the scepticism of some of these high in authority in the republic, the great masses of the Mexican people still believe unfalteringly in the authenticity of the image which has become one of the features of the republic for sightseers. "Our Lady of Guadalupe" is a national institution and the celebration in her honor surpasses in enthusiasm even that of Mexican independence day. As a matter of fact, the Virgin of Guadalupe was the inspiration of the Mexican army when it fought for freedom from the Spanish regime, and her image was borne aloft on the flags of the soldiers of Hidalgo.

THE OLD STEM OF B. & O. REBUILT.

Better Progress in Handling of Freight Expected to Follow Improvement.

Railroad men and others interested in the quick handling of freight on the B. & O. expect to see much evidence of progress in the handling of increased tonnage over the main line of the B. & O. since the rebuilding and improvement of the old stem of the road from Washington Junction on the west to Relay station, near Baltimore on the east. The rehabilitiation of this portion of the road has just been completed with the Alberton cut off.

Over this portion of the road is hauled all of the company's through freight traffic, together with the local freight and passenger business. The work of converting this stretch of track from a crooked line with steep grades to a low grade line of easy curvature was begun with the advent of the Murray regime on the Baltimore and Ohio shortly after the road passed out of the hands of receivers.

President Oscar G. Murray and other executives of the Baltimore and Ohio, after devoting more than four weeks to a general inspection of that system, have just returned to general headquarters in Baltimore. When Mr. Murray was given charge of the traffic department of the Baltimore and Ohio system in 1896 he adopted the slogan, "Get the terminals and roadway in condition to handle the business quickly, and keep them that way, and the tonnage will be forthcoming." Since that time he has devoted a great of attention to terminals in the different districts.

It is admitted that larger terminals are needed in the Pittsburg district and these improvements will in all probability be taken up later. When in Pittsburg President Murray declined to discuss this matter, as the improvement program for next year has not yet been outlined. President Murray devoted considerable time to the new freight terminal at Brunswick which is about completed and which will be used for the classification of eastbound freight. The officials also inspected the new yard at Brunswick, which is among the largest individual yards in the country. Robert Finney general superintendent of the Pittsburg division of the Baltimore and Ohio, who accompanied the party east from Pittsburg, has returned to headquarters in that city.

OLIVER CROMWELL'S WAY.

Oliver Cromwell, who was absolutely ruler of England from 1648 to 1658, although a man of great force of will, was crude and and uncouth. His religious fervor amounted almost to faniticism. He was of vigorous mold and strong convictions. He appeared to be equally great as a military captain and statesman. He arose to every occasion. His vigorous foreign policy made England as much feared abroad as the Lord Protector was at home. That this unlettered farmer could wrest from the hands of Charles I the scepter of a hundred kings, "cut off his head with his crown on it," as he expressed it and make himself absolute, is one of the marvels of history.

In the Long Parliament Cromwell represented the County of Cambrige. Sir Philip Warwick, a royalist contemporary, gives the following description of him.

"I came into the House one morning, well clad, and perceived a gentleman speaking whom I knew not very ordinarily apparelled, for it was a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an ill country tailor. His linen was plain and not very clean, and I remember a speck or two of blood upon his little band, which was not much larger than his collar. His hat was without a hat-band. His stature was of a good size; his sword stuck close to his side; his countenance swollen and reddish; his voice sharp and untunable, and his eloquence full of fervor, for the subject matter would not bear much of reason, it being in behalf of a servant of Mr. Prynne's, who had dispersed libels against the Queen for her dancing, and such like innocent sports. And he aggravated the imprisonment of this man by the council table upon that height that one would have believed the very government itself had been in great danger by it."

After Cromwell's military successes had fired him with the ambition of "taking it upon him to be a king," his first step was to dissolve the Long Parliament, which was not disposed to take orders implicitiy. He repaired to the Parliament House with a strong military force and after making the following speech, turned the members out of doors.

"It is high time for me to put an end to your sitting in this place, which you have dishonored by your contempt of all virtue, and defiled by your practice of every vice. Ye are a factious crew and enemies to all good government. Ye are a pack of mercenary wretches, and would, like Esau, sell your country for a mess of pottage; and like Judas, betray your God for a few pieces of money. Is there a single virtue now remaining among you? Is there one vice you do not possess? You have no more religion than my horse. Gold is your god. Which of you has not bartered away your conscience for bribes? Is there a man among you that has the care for the good of the commonwealth? You, who were deputed here by the people to get their grievances redressed, are yourselves become their greatest grievance. Your country, therefore, calls upon me to cleanse this Augean stable, by putting a final period to your iniquitous proceedings. And by God's help and the strength He has given me I am come to do it. I command you, therefore, upon the peril of your lives, to depart immediately out of this place. Go, get you out; make haste; ye venal slaves, begone!"

cracking of rifles from rock and ravine. Men fell cursing, and the frightened horses swerved, their riders struggling madly with their mounts, the column thrown into momentary confusion. But the surprised cavalrymen, quailing beneath the hot fire poured into them, rallied to the shouts of their officers, and swung into a slender battle front, stretching out their thin line from the bank of the river to the sharp uplift of the western bluffs. Scarcely 150 white troopers waited to stem as best they might that fierce onrush of 1,200 battle-crazed braves.

For an almost-breathless space those mingled hordes of Sioux and Cheyennes hesitated to drive straight home their death-blow. They knew those silent men in the blue shirts, knew they died hard. Upon that slight pause pivoted the fate of the day; upon it hung the lives of those other men riding boldly and trustfully across the sunlit ridges above. "Audacity, always audacity," that is the accepted motto for a cavalryman. And be the cause what it may, it was here that Maj. Reno failed. In that supreme instant he was guilty of hesitancy, doubt, delay. He chose defense in preference to attack, dallied where he should have acted. The observing savages, gathering courage from his apparent weakness, burst forth in resistless torrent against the slender, unsupported line, turned his flank by one fierce charge, and hurled the struggling troopers back with a rush into the narrow strip of timber bordering the river.

The whole narrow valley seemed to swarm with braves; they poured forth from sheltering coulees and shadowed ravines; they dashed down in countless numbers from the distant village. Custer, now far away behind the bluffs, and almost beyond sound of the firing, was utterly ignored. Every savage chief knew exactly where that column was, but it could wait its turn.

In leaderless effort to break away from that swift-gathering cordon, before the red, remorseless folds should close tighter and crush them to death, the troopers, half of them already dismounted, burst from cover in an endeavor to attain the shelter of the bluffs. The deadly Indian rifles flamed in their faces, and they were hurled back, a mere fleeing mob, searching for nothing in that moment of terror but a possible passageway across the stream. Through some rare providence of God, they chanced to strike the banks at a spot where the river proved fordable. They plunged headlong in, officers and men commingled, the Indian bullets churning up the water on every side. The loss in that wild retreat (which Reno later called a "charge") was heavy, the effect demoralizing; but those who escaped found a spot well suited for defense. Even as they swung down from off their wounded, panting horses and flung themselves flat upon their faces to sweep with hastily leveled carbines the river banks below, Benteen came trotting gallantly down the valley to their aid, his troopers fresh and eager to be thrown forward on the firing-line. The worst was over, and like maddened lions, the rallied soldiers of the Seventh, cursing their folly, turned to strike and slay.

A line of skirmishers was hastily thrown forward along the edge of the bluff, while volunteers, urged by the agonized cries of the wounded, endeavored vainly to procure a supply of water from the river. Again and again they made the effort, only to be driven back by the deadly Indian rifle fire. By three o'clock, although the majority of the savages had departed down the river, enough remained to keep up a galling fire, and hold Reno strictly on the defensive.

As the men lay exposed to the continuous sniping fire, above the surrounding din were borne to their ears the reports of distant guns. It came distinctly from the northward, growing heavier and more continuous. None among them doubted its ominous meaning. Custer was already engaged in hot action at the right of the Indian village. Why were they kept lying there in idleness? Why were they not pushed forward to do their part? They looked into each other's faces. God! They were 300 nor; they could sweep aside like chaff that fringe of red skirmishers if only they got the word! Officer after office, unable to restrain his impatience, strode back across the bluff summit, and whistling bullets, and personally legged the major to speak the one word which should hurl them to the rescue. They cried like women, they swore through clinched teeth, they openly exhibited their contempt for such a commander, yet the discipline of army service made active disobedience impossible. They went reluctantly back, as helpless as children.

It was four o'clock, the shadows of the western bluffs already darkening the river bank. Suddenly a faint cheer ran along the lines, and the men lifted themselves to gaze up the river. Urging the tired animals to a trot, the strong hand of a trooper grasping every halter-strap, Brant was swinging his long pack-train up the smoke-wreathed valley. The outriding flankers exchanged constant shots with the skulking savages hiding in every ravine and coulee. Pausing only to protect their wounded, fighting their way step by step, N troop ran the gantlet and came charging into the cheering lines with every pound of their treasure safe. Weir of D, whose dismounted troopers held that portion of the line, strode a pace forward to greet the leader, and as the extended hands of the officers met, there echoed down to them from the north the reports of two heavy volleys, fired in rapid succession. The sounds were clear, distinctly audible even above the uproar of the valley. The heavy eyes of the two soldiers met, their dust-streaked faces flushed.

"That was a signal, Custer's signal for help!" the younger man cried, impulsively, his voice full of agony. "For God's sake, Weir, what are you fellows waiting here for?"

The other uttered a groan, his hand flung in contempt back toward the bluff summit. "The cowardly fool won't move; he's whipped to death now."

"Reno, you mean? Whipped? You haven't lost 20 men. Is this the Seventh?—skulking here under cover while Custer begs help? Doesn't the man know? Doesn't he understand? By heaven, I'll face him myself! I'll make him act, even if I have to damn him to his face."

He swung his horse with a jerk to the left, but even as the spurs touched, Weir grasped the taut rein firmly.

"It's no use, Brant. It's been done; we've all been at him. He's simply lost his head. Know? Of course he knows. Martini struck us just below here, as we were coming in, with a message from Custer. It would have stirred the blood of anyone but him—Oh, God! It's terrible."

"A message? What was it?"

"Cook wrote it, and addressed it to Benteen. It read: 'Come on. Big village. Be quick. Bring packs.' And then, 'P. S.—Bring packs.' That means they want ammunition badly; they're fighting to the death out yonder, and they need powder. Oh, the coward!"

Brant's eyes ran down the waiting line of his own men, sitting their saddles beside the halted pack animals.

Brant Was Swinging His Pack-Train Up the Smoke-Wreathed Valley.

He leaned over and dropped one hand heavily on Weir's shoulder. "The rest of you can do as you please, but N troop is going to take those ammunition packs to Custer if there's any possible way to get through, orders or no orders." He straightened up in the saddle, and his voice sounded down the wearied line like the blast of a trumpet.

"Attention! N troop! Right face; dress. Number four bring forward the ammunition packs. No, leave the others where they are: move lively, men!"

He watched them swing like magic into formation, their dust-begrimed faces lighting up with animation. They knew their officer, and this meant business.

"Unsling carbines—load!"

Weir, the veteran soldier, glanced down that steady line of ready troopers, and then back to Brant's face. "Do you mean it? Are you going up those bluffs? Good Heavens, man, it will mean a courtmartial."

"Custer commands the Seventh. I command the pack-train," said Brant. "His orders are to bring up the packs. Perhaps I can't get through alone, but I'll try. Better a courtmartial than to fail those men out there. Going? Of course I'm going. Into line—take intervals—forward!"

"Attention, D troop!" It was Weir's voice, eager and determined now. Like an undammed current his orders rang out above the uproar, and in a moment the gallant troopers of N and D, some on foot, some in saddle, were rushing up the face of the bluff, their officers leading, the precious ammunition packs at the center, all alike scrambling for the summit, in spite of the crackling of Indian rifles from every side. Panting, breathless from the hard climb, their carbines spitting fire while the rapidly massing savages began circling their exposed position, the little band fought their way forward a hundred yards. Then they halted, blocked by the numbers barring their path, glancing back anxiously in hope that their effort would encourage others to join them. They could do it; they could do it if only the rest of the boys would come. They poured in their volleys and waited. But Reno made no move. Weir and Brant, determined to hold every inch thus gained, threw the dismounted men on their faces behind every projection of earth, and encircled the ridge with flame. If they could not advance, they would not be driven back. Messenger after messenger, taking life in hand, was sent skurrying down the bluff, to beg reinforcements to push on for the rescue, swearing it was possible. But it was after five o'clock before Reno moved. Then cautiously he advanced his column toward where N and D troops yet held desperately to the exposed ridge. He came too late. That distant firing had ceased, and all need for further advance had ended. Scarcely had reinforcements attained the summit before the torrent of savagery burst screeching on their front.

From point to point the grim struggle raged, till nightfall wrought partial cessation. The wearied troopers stretched out their lines so as to protect the packs and the field hospital, threw themselves on the ground, digging rifle-pits with knives and tin pans. Not until nine o'clock did the Indian fire slacken, and then the village became a scene of savage revel, the wild yelling plainly audible to the soldiers above.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The Old Regiment.

By the time Hampton swung up the coulee, he had dismissed from his attention everything but the business that had brought him there. He experienced no fear, no premonition of coming disaster, yet the reawakened plainsman in him kept him sufficiently wary and cautious. He possessed a soldier's proud confidence in his regiment—the supposition that the old fighting Seventh could be defeated was impossible; the Indian did not ride those uplands who could do the deed! Then there came to him a nameless dread, that instinctive shrinking which a proud, sensitive man must ever feel at having to face his old companions with the shadow of a crime between. In his memory he saw once more a low-ceilinged room, having a table extending down the center, with grave-faced men, dressed in the full uniform of the service, looking at him amid a silence like unto death; and at the head sat a man with long fair hair and mustache, his proud eyes never to be forgotten. Now, after silent years, he was going to look into those accusing eyes again. He pressed his hand against his forehead, his body trembled; then he braced himself for the interview, and the shuddering coward in him shrank back.

Away to the left something was moving, a dim, shapeless dash of color. It might be Benteen, but of Reno's columns he could perceive nothing, nor anything of Custer's excepting that broad track across the prairies marked by his horses' hoofs. This track Hampton followed, pressing his fresh mount to increased speed, confident that no Indian spies would be loitering so closely in the rear of that body of cavalry, and becoming fearful lest the attack should occur before he could arrive.

He dipped over a sharp ridge and came suddenly upon the rear guard. They were a little squad of dusty, brown-faced troopers, who instantly wheeled into line at sound of approaching hoofs, the barrels of their lowered carbines glistening in the sun. With a swing of the hand and a hoarse shout of "Dispatches!" he was beyond them, bending low over his saddle pommel, his eyes on the dust cloud of the moving column. The extended line of horsemen, riding in columns of four, came to a sudden halt, and he raced on. A little squad of officers, several of their number dismounted, were out in front, standing grouped just beyond the summit of a slight elevation, apparently looking off into the valley through some cleft in the bluff beyond. Standing among these, Hampton perceived the long fair hair, and the erect figure clad in the well-known frontier costume, of the man he sought—the proud, dashing leader of light cavalry, that beau ideal of the sabreur, the one he dreaded most, the one he loved best—Custer. The commander stood, field-glasses in hand, pointing down into the valley, and the dispatch bearer, reigning in his horse, his lips white but resolute, trotted straight up the slope toward him. Custer wheeled, annoyed at the interruption, and Hampton swung down from the saddle, his rein flung across his arm, took a single step forward, lifting his hand in salute, and held forth the sealed packet.

"Dispatches, sir," he said, simply, standing motionless as a statue.

The commander, barely glancing toward him, instantly tore open the long official envelope and ran his eyes over the dispatch amid a hush in the conversation.

"Gentlemen," he commented to the little group gathered about him, yet without glancing up from the paper in his hand, "Crook was defeated over on the Rosebud the 17th, and forced to retire. That will account for the unexpected number of hostiles fronting us up here, Cook; but the greater the task, the greater the glory. Ah, I thought as much. I am advised by the department to keep in close touch with Terry and Gibbons, and to hold off from making a direct attack until infantry can arrive in support. Rather late in the day, I take it, when we are already within easy rifle-shot. I see nothing in these orders to interfere with our present plans, nor any military neces[illegible] for playing mud and seek all summer in these hills. That looks like a big village down yonder, but I have led the dandy Seventh into others just as large."

He stopped speaking, and glanced up inquiringly into the face of the silent messenger, apparently mistaking him for one of his own men.

"Where did you get this?"

"Cheyenne, sir."

"What! Do you mean to say you brought it through from there?"

"Silent Murphy carried it as far as the Powder river. He went crazy there, and I was compelled to strap him. I brought it the rest of the way."

"Where is Murphy?"

"Back with the pack train, sir. I got him through alive, but entirely gone in the head."

"Run across many hostiles in that region?"

"They were thick this side the Rosebud; all bucks and traveling north."

"Sioux?"

"Mostly, sir; but I saw one band wearing Cheyenne war bonnets."

A puzzled look slowly crept into the strong face of the abrupt questioner, his stern, commanding eyes studying the man standing motionless before him, with freshly awakened interest. The gaze of the other faltered, then came back courageously.

"I recognize you now," Custer said, quietly. "Am I to understand you are again in the service?"

"My presence here is purely accidental, Gen. Custer. The opportunity came to me to do this work, and I very gladly accepted the privilege."

The commander hesitated, scarcely knowing what he might be justified in saying to this man.

"It's a brave deed, well performed," he said at last, with soldierly cordiality, "although I can hardly offer you a fitting reward."

"There is little I desire," he replied, slowly, "and that is to be permitted to ride once more into action in the ranks of the Seventh."

The true-hearted, impulsive, manly soldier fronting him reddened to the roots of his fair hair, his proud eyes softening.

"Spoken like a true soldier," he exclaimed, a new warmth in his voice. "You shall have your wish. Take position in Calhoun's troop yonder."

Hampton turned quietly away, leading his horse, yet had scarcely advanced three yards before Custer halted him.

"I shall be pleased to talk with you again after the fight," he said, briefly, as though half doubting the propriety of such words.

The other bowed, his face instantly brightening. "I thank you sincerely."

The perplexed commander stood motionless, gazing after the receding figure, his face grown grave and thoughtful. Then he turned to the wondering adjutant beside him.

"You never knew him, did you, Cook?"

"I think not, sir; who is he?"

"Capt Nolan—you have heard the story."

"Is that so?" he exclaimed, in evident surprise. "He has a manly face."

"Ay, and he was as fine a soldier as ever fought under a flag," declared Custer, frankly. "Poor devil. The hardest service I was ever called upon to perform was the day we broke him. I wonder if Calhoun will recognize the face; they were good friends once."

He stopped speaking, and for a time his field-glasses were fastened upon a small section of the Indian village nestled in the green valley.

"I doubt if many warriors are there," he commented at last. "They may have gone up the river to intercept Reno's advance, and if so, this should be our time to strike. Return to your commands, gentlemen, and with the order of march see personally that your men move quietly. We must strike quick and hard, driving the wedge home with a single blow. That will be all at present, gentlemen; you will require no further instructions until we deploy. Capt. Calhoun, just a word."

The captain thus directly addressed, a handsome, stalwart man of middle age, reined in his horse and waited.

"Captain, the messenger who has just brought us dispatches from Cheyenne is a civilian, but has requested permission to have a share in this coming fight. I have assigned him to your troop."

Calhoun bowed.

"I thought to spare you any possible embarrassment by saying that the man is not entirely unknown to you."

"May I ask his name?"

"Robert Nolan."

The strong, lion-like face flushed under its tan, then quickly lit up with a smile. "I thank you. Capt. Nolan will not suffer at my hands."

He rode straight toward his troop, his eyes searching the ranks until they rested upon the averted face of Hampton. He pressed forward, and leaned from the saddle, extending a gauntleted hand. "Nolan, old man welcome back to the Seventh!"

For an instant their eyes met, those of the officer filled with manly sympathy, the other's moistened and dim, his face like marble. Then the two hands clasped and clung, in a grip more eloquent than words. It was Calhoun who spoke.

"I mean it all, Nolan. From that day to this I have believed in you—have held you friend."

For a moment the man reeled; then, as though inspired by a newborn hope, he sat firmly erect, and lifted his hand in salute. "Those are words I have longed to hear spoken for 15 years. They are more than life to me. May God help me to be worthy of them. Oh, Calhoun, Calhoun!"

For a brief space the two remained still and silent, their faces reflecting repressed feeling. Then the voice of command sounded out in front; Calhoun gently withdrew his hand from the other's grasp, and with bowed head rode slowly to the front of his troops.

In columns of four, silent, with not a canteen rattling, with scabbards thrust under their stirrup leathers, each man sitting in his saddle like a statue, ready carbine flung forward across the pommel, those sunburnt troopers moved steadily down the broad coulee. The troopers riding at either side of Hampton wondering still at their captain's peculiar words and actions, glanced curiously at the new comrade, marveling at his tightly pressed lips, his moistened eyes. Yet in all the glorious column, no heart lighter than his, or happier, pressed forward to meet a warrior's death.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—A detachment of the Eighteenth infantry from Fort Bethune trapped by Indians in a narrow gorge. CHAPTER XXXI.—Brant's troop guarding Custer's pack train on Little Big Horn rescues Hampton and Murphy. Hampton insists on going on to join Custer and deliver the dispatches. Tells Brant Naida is daughter of Capt. Nolan who was convicted of murdering his father. Murphy, now insane, could clear Capt. Nolan of charge if he recovers his mind. Leaves package of papers bearing on the subject with Brant when he goes to join Custer.

ABSINTHE DRINKING.

Attempts to Stem Curse of the French Nation.

Absinthe-drinking has frequently been characterized as the curse of modern France. Absinthe, which is distilled from alcohol in which wormwood leaves have been crushed, is a peculiarly destructive drink. Its effects are so much worse than those of any other alcoholic beverage that a commission was appointed some time ago to recommend some way of checking the ravages of the habit. The committee has recommended that the manufacture of absinthe shall cease in a year, and that after two years its sale shall be forbidden. This report has been adopted by the committee on hygiene of the chamber of deputies and reported to the chamber. It does not yet appear whether the nation is sufficiently roused to the evil to make certain the passage of the necessary law. The absinthe habit has a curious origin. The French soldiers in Algiers during the war of 1844-7 were advised to mix wormwood with their wine to prevent or cure the fevers to which they were liable in northern Africa. On their return to France they continued to put the wormwood in their wine, and introduced the drink to their friends, and soon the distillers put on the market what is now known as absinthe, with the bitter taste of the wormwood disguised by anise.

DEVIL AN EXPENSIVE MASTER.

Cost of Crime and Its Cure in the United States Compared.

The chaplain of the Evangelical Prison society of New York, Rev. John J. Munro, has compiled some astonishing figures as to the cost of crime in the United States, and publishes them in Harper's Weekly. He calculates that in the whole country the total annual expense of maintaining police forces, criminal courts and prisons is approximately $750,000,000. The yearly loss occasioned by crimes against property appears to be above $150,000,000. If to this is added the loss of wages suffered by persons confined in prison, the grand total of crime cost every year in America would reach the stupendous sum of $1,076,000,000, which is a tax of more than one per cent. upon the aggregate wealth of the nation. Contrasted with this, all the moral curative agencies in the country, including churches, schools, hospitals and humanitarian social work, cost only $550,000,000 a year. From the most calculating material standpoint economy would appear to demand a larger outlay for religious and sociological reform work in order to abridge this crime waste.

Manufacturers and the Drink Evil.

An added evidence of the baneful influence of drink on manufacturing interests, has recently been given in a protest from the glass manufacturers of Alexandria, Ind., against drinking resorts in the neighborhood of their plants. Two enterprises, giving employment to more than 1,000 people, and representing the industrial mainstays of the city, have notified the council that they will make no further extensions or improvements unless the saloons are taken totally out of the factory district and their territory limited strictly to the business portion of the city.

Three Significant Statements.

Dr. McAdam Eccles, a London physician noted for his wide life assurance experience, lays down the three suggestive propositions: (1) From the universal experience of assurance offices, the excessive use of alcohol undoubtedly shortens life. (2) An increasing number of statistics over an increasing number of years show that even a moderate amount of alcohol habitually taken tends to shorten life. (3) Total abstainers show a distinctly greater longevity than any other class of the community.

Postpone Their Convention.

The Christian Endeavorers are actively planning for a great assembly at Seattle in July, but the board of control of the Epworth league has just decided that it would be better not to try to hold the convention of their societies which would in the regular order fall this year. The vote of the board is to hold national conventions quadrennially hereafter; therefore the league's next gathering will occur in 1909.

Total Abstinence in Denmark.

In Denmark there are at present 14 total abstinence associations, representing a membership of 122,207 persons. The growth of the temperance sentiment throughout the land is shown in the increase of 21,757 members in these societies during the past two years. No less than 38,884 members are enrolled in one of the orders alone.

Drink in the United States.

Recent statistics show that the use of wine and spirits in the United States is on the decrease, while beer is becoming more popular. There are fewer retail liquor dealers now than there were a year ago, while the number of places where beer is sold is increasing rapidly.

THE CHRISTIAN SUMMER RESORT.

The purpose of the Kingdom God is the salvation of man. This man is a trinity—spirit, mind and body. The institution, call it Church, if you please, that reaches and holds man must satisfy his three-fold nature. The erection and maintenance of tens of thousands of beautiful churches tell us that the Church is not unmindful of the salvation of the spirit-man.

The many colleges and other educational institutions emphasize the fact that the Church not only seeks to save the spirit-man but that she is determined to culture the intellectual-man for the most efficient service. The gracious ministry of her sons and daughters in hospitals and other institutions of like character speaks most emphatically of her devotion to the work of repair when the body is worn and broken in the battles of life.

If this ministry be Christly even more so is that whose aim is to furnish opportunities for the recreation that will prevent the necessity of sending our bodies to the repair shop. Under the inspiration of this idea men like Moody at Northfield, Vincent at Chantauqua, have founded the Christian summer resort where God is the dominant note weather in the sermon from the pulpit, the lecture from the platform or in the recreation hour. Too long have the men and women of the Church been compelled to go to the summer resort where God is a broken chord. Vacation food is just as important as spiritual and mental food. More and more will the Church recognize the splendid cooperation of the christian summer resort, more and more will she urge that the place of vacation shall be the place where God is the dominant note, more and more will she cooperate in the work of the christian summer resort, helping them to obtain results such as have been thus far only seen in visoins by those whom the Lord has led to the top of the Mount of Vision. Already the Church is realizing that as her benefactions to the spirit-man agencies are to receive their dividend in the good work done, already she is learning the wisdom of asking for her educational benefactions a dividend, not in the lawful money of this world, but in the large number of young men and women coming from her schools, trained for the highest service. Even so the day is at hand when the church will most liberally cooperate in the establishment and maintenance of a chain of great christian summer resorts in our land that will enrich spiritually, intellectually and physically the lives of her sons and daughters who tarry during the vacation period, within their gates. If men make large gifts to the church because of the good it is doing, if men liberally endow the college because of the good it does, so men will give liberally to the christian summer resort because of the good it is doing. Obligation to give to the first two is equal obligation to cooperate with and to give to the Christian resort. Why not? We are fortunate in having within our county one of America's great Christian Summer Resorts—Mountain Lake Park. To enumerate her many gifts to the people of Garrett county would be an impossibility. Besides those of the home county who have been born again within her gates, or who have been led to new heights of intellectual vision, or have had their bodies made stronger for carrying the burdens of service, her ministry of inspiration has gone to many lands from this mountain top beautiful. All hail Mountain Lake Park! Her past has been one of great blessing. Her future destined to be even greater in sending out into the fields of service men and women more strongly equipped spirtually, mentally and physically because of their having tarried awhile on this mount of privilege. The people should and do rejoice in the opportunity to cooperate with the management of this splendid Christian resort in its three-fold work of culturing the spirit-man, sharpening the intellectual man and training the physical-man.

OUR WEALTH INCREASED.

We are wealthier than we thought we were. We read that the average amount of money in circulation the first day of this month is $34.71 for each person in the United States; that our individual gain was $1.48 for the month of November. We hadn't felt that much richer, but we suppose we are, since a great financier has given the figures. Our financial friend says "these are impressive figures." And that is true. They have impressed us very much. But we find it hard to agree with a further statement that, "to issue more money would be a positive menace." We never pretend to understand the financial situation and we are willing to let these who understand it manage it, but why should they thrust an extra $1.48 on us in November and let the month pass before they told up about it, and now refuse us another $1.48 for this month when Christmas is so near? If they had told us that we were going to get the extra $1.48, we would have tried to use it so they would not have felt that it was a "positive menace" to issue more. Ah, well! The ways of financiers are past finding out. As if to ease the force of the blow administed by saying more would be a "menace" our financier announces that "in the last decade the money actually in circulation in the country has raised from $1,600,000,000 to a trifle over $3,000,000,000, while the per capita amount has grown almost $12." We presume he thinks that we are getting rich fast enough, and we will have to be satisfied.

DALZELL'S BILL.

Congressman John Dalzell has introducted a bill in the House which should become a law. It provides a penalty of $5000 and imprisonment for the circulation of any false or scandalous reports concerning national banks. Many reckless statements are made by people in regard to banks always annoying and often hurtful to the institutions and their depositors. Such statements are sometimes made thoughtlessly and at other times maliciously, but no matter how or why they are made, they should be stopped for the good of every community. If the proposed law will silence the careless and reckless talkers, let us have it.

ONE DAY'S JOURNEY IN A ROW BOAT.

Mr. Burt Wilson, of Garrett County, Makes a Record Run In Florida Waters.

Leesburg, Fla., Dec., 14, 1907.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

Perhaps a narration of one day spent in a row boat on some of the beautiful lakes and rivers of Florida may interest my friends in Garrett. After coming here, one month ago, I got a boat to be used for hunting, fishing, etc., which was launched on Lake Griffin. Fishing in Lake Griffin was not as productive as I wished, so concluded to move my boat to Lake Harris, and a notion to row it around by way of Ocklawaha river, Lake Eustis and Dead River appealed to me. I was warned by Capt. Ludlow, who is familiar with the waters about here, that I could not find the mouth of the Ocklawaha, also that the distance, thirty-five miles, was too great for one days rowing, but I started at 4:45 a. m. and after battling against the wind and waves of Lake Griffin for two hours I came to the thousand acre patch of water lilies that border this part of the lake, then after rowing around among floating islands, finally found a current of water coming out of the saw grass scarcely a rod wide, but it proved to be the river. It is twelve miles through to Lake Eustis and I had to go against the currant, but the ever changing panorama of natural beauty was stimulant enough. Then into Lake Eustis. It is famed as being one of the most beautiful of this chain of lakes. Dead River connecting Lake Eustis and Lake Harris is bordered by large moss covered cypress trees, and then we come to the largest and best of all, Lake Harris, fifteen miles long by Eight wide, on the shores of which are many orange groves, pretty homes and prosperous villages.

What impressed me most on this trip was the great number and variety of birds. Hundreds of different kinds from humming birds to eagles, ducks by hundreds. I could have killed several but was satisfied with two (my appetite for duck was not the best as I had been out a few days before and brought home twenty ducks). I also caught three fine black bass, about ten pounds, got home in time for supper with a very good appetite for it, having made a trip in a row boat that no "Florida cracker" has attempted in a single day.

BURT WILSON,

RECEIVER FOR HOTEL RANDOLPH.

Second Hotel At Elkins Goes Into Hands Of Receiver Within Ten Days.

ELKINS, W. Va., Dec. 17.—Judge Holt today appointed W. E. Baker receiver for the Hotel Randolph Company, "Uncle Johnny" Wilson and his son have for several months been managers of the Hotel Randolph, but owing to the large amount of indebtedness against it, which is said to amount to more than $60,000, they have been unable to keep up the operating expenses of the hotel and at the same time meet the interest on the out-standing indebtedness. This is the second Elkins hotel to go into the hands of a receiver. The Gassaway hotel about ten days ago went into the hands of a receiver.

Much of the so-called friendship of the day is but a pretense. It exists only in name and as soon as it ceases to be advantageous it is dropped. The friendship that continues the same in prosperity and adversity is to be prized, but all other kinds are worthless. It matters not how hard a man may struggle to do right and make a success of life there is always some loathsome reptile, some worthless wretch who is ready to drag him down, to blight his hopes and blast his fondest ambitions. The loss of money and property is not the greatest loss a man can sustain in the business world; far better to lose your money than to lose hope and ambition.

The Book of Nehemiah Verified.

Prof. Clermont Ganneau has given the public, so to speak, advance sheets of the important discoveries lately made by the German scientific mission, working under Herr Rubensohn side by side with the French, on the island of Elephanta, on the Nile. Latterly the sands of Egypt have been yielding up their treasures in lavish profusion. Last month it was a lost comedy of Menander, and not long before the "Logia" of Jesus, taking us back to the origin of Christianity. But while explorers were almost daily unearthing relics of the Greek and Eygptian eras, it was seldom that any Jewish fragment was turned up. Now, however, among some papyri found by the Germans within 50 yards of Professor Ganneau's diggers, is an official document of the seventeenth year of Darius, addressed to the Persian governor of Judea by the Jewish priests of the Temple of Elephanta. The document is long and interesting, but its inestimable value lies in the fact that it calls up historical figures familiar in the Bible, such as Jonathan, high priest of Jerusalem, and Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, says a Paris letter in the New York Sun.

This papyrus, which is in the Aramaic character, has been deciphered by Professor Sachau, of Berlin, and turns out to be an authentic page to be added to the Book of Nehemiah. This wonderful document is a petition addressed by the Jewish inhabitants of the Island of Elephanta, speaking through the priest, Jeduyah, and his colleagues, to the Lord Baghoi, the Persian governor of Samariah in the seventeenth year of the reign of King Darius. After having invoked, in terms almost identical with those of the papyrus of Turia, the blessing of the "God of Gods" on the head of the governor, the petitioners made supplication as follows:

Three years previously in the absence of Arsam the Satrap of Egypt, summoned to meet his king, the Egyptian servants of the god Khnum of Elephanta intrigued with the governor of the island, Widrang (bribed by them, according to the famous Euting papyrus), and procured from him an order for the military commandant of Syrene for the destruction of the temple of Jehovah that stood on the Island of Elephanta. This temple, say they, was builded by their forefathers in old times, and was there when the land of Egypt was conquered by Cambyses, who spared it while he destroyed all the temples of the Egyptians.

According to the description the petitioners incidentally give, this temple must have been an imposing pile, built of massive blocks of stone, with seven monumental gates, columns of granite and a roof of cedar. The orders of Widrang were ruthlessly executed and the troops, helped by an Egyptian horde, demolished the venerable sanctuary, destroying all that it contained with fire after carrying away the vessels of gold and silver and other precious objects.

All the Jewish population of Elephanta, men, women and children, plunged into the depths of affliction by this calamity, went into mourning and wept and fasted calling upon Jehovah the "God of Gods." No more did they anoint themselves with ointments or drink any wine. Sometime afterward Widrank fell into disgrace and was forced to make restitution, while those who had executed his orders were all slain in just expiation of their sins. Nevertheless, the petitioners say, they have not to this day, in spite of all their striving, obtained leave to rebuild their temple, and so for three years they have not left off their mourning, being precluded from making their ritual sacrifices or offering up incense on the altar of Jehovah, the "God of Gods." In vain after the catastrophe did they appeal to Bagohi himself, governor of Judea, and then to Jehohanan, high priest of Jerusalem, and to his brother, Ostan Anani, and to the princess of the House of Judah. Wherefore they come now, a second time, to implore Bagohi to show them favor and allow them to rebuild in Elephanta the temple of Jehovah as it once stood.

In return for this boon "they will offer up sacrifices to Jehovah on the new altar in his name, and until it is built all the Israelitish men, momen and children of the island will never cease praying for Bagohi." Furthermore, they give him to understand that he will reap more substantial benefits in a sum of 1,000 talents of silver in the offerings, without count of the gold, concerning which he has already been informed. And, in conclusion, they mention that they have written also to Delayah and Chelamayah, son of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, but that the Satrap Arsam, recalled by Darius, knows not of the matter. From other papyrus and fragments not yet published it is seen that, thanks to the intervention of Bagohi and Delayah, the permission was granted and the temple of Jehovah rebuilt.

The inestimable value of these new discoveries lies in their corroboration of the biblical story, and besides the names of Jehohanan and Sanballat mentioned in the Old Testiment, the Governor Bagohi is to be found in the historian Flavius Josephus, in the Greek form of Bagoas. Prof. Clermont Ganneau, who gives the above details, has especial reason to be congratulated on this discovery, although not actually made by himself, since it seems to place beyond all doubt the correctness of the belief that the old temple of Jehovah was on the Island of Elephanta—a belief that he was almost alone for a long time in holding against the majority, who located it at Syene, on the opposite shores of the Nile. At present he is in charge of a French mission subventioned by the Academy, by the missistry and also by M. Edmund Rothschild, which is excavating on the island side by side with the German explorers, and the keenest rivalry exists between the two groups, who are working literally shoulder to shoulder within a few yards of each, other, each, however, with a radius exactly defined and marked out by wire fences.

No Hindrance.

One day a celebrated advocate was arguing before a very rude old Scotch Judge, who pointed with one forefinger to one of his ears and with the other to the opposite one. "You see this, Mr. X?" "I do, my lord," said the advocate. "Well, it just goes in here and comes out there," and his lordship smiled with the hilarity of a Judge who thinks he has actually said a good thing. "I don't doubt it, my lord," replied the advocate, "what is there to prevent it."—Bellman.

Now, however, among some papyri found by the Germans within 50 yards of Professor Ganneau's diggers, is an official document of the seventeenth year of Darius, addressed to the Persian governor of Judea by the Jewish priests of the Temple of Elephanta. The document is long and interesting, but its inestimable value lies in the fact that it calls up historical figures familiar in the Bible, such as Jonathan, high priest of Jerusalem, and Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, says a Paris letter in the New York Sun.

This papyrus, which is in the Aramaic character, has been deciphered by Professor Sachau, of Berlin, and turns out to be an authentic page to be added to the Book of Nehemiah. This wonderful document is a petition addressed by the Jewish inhabitants of the Island of Elephanta, speaking through the priest, Jeduyah, and his colleagues, to the Lord Baghoi, the Persian governor of Samariah in the seventeenth year of the reign of King Darius. After having invoked, in terms almost identical with those of the papyrus of Turia, the blessing of the "God of Gods" on the head of the governor, the petitioners made supplication as follows:

Three years previously in the absence of Arsam the Satrap of Egypt, summoned to meet his king, the Egyptian servants of the god Khnum of Elephanta intrigued with the governor of the island, Widrang (bribed by them, according to the famous Euting papyrus), and procured from him an order for the military commandant of Syrene for the destruction of the temple of Jehovah that stood on the Island of Elephanta. This temple, say they, was builded by their forefathers in old times, and was there when the land of Egypt was conquered by Cambyses, who spared it while he destroyed all the temples of the Egyptians.

According to the description the petitioners incidentally give, this temple must have been an imposing pile, built of massive blocks of stone, with seven monumental gates, columns of granite and a roof of cedar. The orders of Widrang were ruthlessly executed and the troops, helped by an Egyptian horde, demolished the venerable sanctuary, destroying all that it contained with fire after carrying away the vessels of gold and silver and other precious objects.

All the Jewish population of Elephanta, men, women and children, plunged into the depths of affliction by this calamity, went into mourning and wept and fasted calling upon Jehovah the "God of Gods." No more did they anoint themselves with ointments or drink any wine. Sometime afterward Widrank fell into disgrace and was forced to make restitution, while those who had executed his orders were all slain in just expiation of their sins. Nevertheless, the petitioners say, they have not to this day, in spite of all their striving, obtained leave to rebuild their temple, and so for three years they have not left off their mourning, being precluded from making their ritual sacrifices or offering up incense on the altar of Jehovah, the "God of Gods." In vain after the catastrophe did they appeal to Bagohi himself, governor of Judea, and then to Jehohanan, high priest of Jerusalem, and to his brother, Ostan Anani, and to the princess of the House of Judah. Wherefore they come now, a second time, to implore Bagohi to show them favor and allow them to rebuild in Elephanta the temple of Jehovah as it once stood.

In return for this boon "they will offer up sacrifices to Jehovah on the new altar in his name, and until it is built all the Israelitish men, women and children of the island will never cease praying for Bagohi." Furthermore, they give him to understand that he will reap more substantial benefits in a sum of 1,000 talents of silver in the offerings, without count of the gold, concerning which he has already been informed. And, in conclusion, they mention that they have written also to Delayah and Chelamayah, son of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, but that the Satrap Arsam, recalled by Darius, knows not of the matter. From other papyrus and fragments not yet published it is seen that, thanks to the intervention of Bagohi and Delayah, the permission was granted and the temple of Jehovah rebuilt.

The inestimable value of these new discoveries lies in their corroboration of the biblical story, and besides the names of Jehohanan and Sanballat mentioned in the Old Testiment, the Governor Bagohi is to be found in the historian Flavius Josephus, in the Greek form of Bagoas. Prof. Clermont Ganneau, who gives the above details, has especial reason to be congratulated on this discovery, although not actually made by himself, since it seems to place beyond all doubt the correctness of the belief that the old temple of Jehovah was on the Island of Elephanta—a belief that he was almost alone for a long time in holding against the majority, who located it at Syene, on the opposite shores of the Nile. At present he is in charge of a French mission subventioned by the Academy, by the missistry and also by M. Edmund Rothschild, which is excavating on the island side by side with the German explorers, and the keenest rivalry exists between the two groups, who are working literally shoulder to shoulder within a few yards of each, other, each, however, with a radius exactly defined and marked out by wire fences.

No Hindrance.

One day a celebrated advocate was arguing before a very rude old Scotch Judge, who pointed with one forefinger to one of his ears and with the other to the opposite one. "You see this, Mr. X?" "I do, my lord," said the advocate. "Well, it just goes in here and comes out there," and his lordship smiled with the hilarity of a Judge who thinks he has actually said a good thing. "I don't doubt it, my lord," replied the advocate, "what is there to prevent it."—Bellman.

PRISONERS TO THE PENITENTARY.

Four Convicted at The Recent Term of Caurt Transported Monday Morning.

Monday morning on train No. 4, which passes through Oakland at 12:29 o'clock, Sheriff A. L. Lee, assisted by ex-Sheriff Edward J. Frantz, took to the Maryland Penitentiary at Baltimore the four persons convicted at the recent term of the Circuit Court and sentenced by Judge Henderson to serve terms of varying duration in the penal institution, as follows:

Charles Hood, who was found guilty by Judges Boyd and Henderson of manslaughter by causing the death of Robert Clingan in Oakland last July, to serve five years as the penalty of his unfortunate act.

Ezra Butler, guilty of an attempted felonious assault, eight years.

George Queer, for stealing a watch, the property of Prince Albert Shrout, three years.

Fred. Banks, colored, for assaulting and robbing a horse trader on the road between Oakland and Mountain Lake Park, seven yenrs. Banks is one of the five prisoners who escaped from the jail here shortly after the new prison was completed, being captured last summer at Meyersdale, Pa., and brought to Oakland by Sheriff Lee a day or two afterward.

Let us once again make the old—probably an unnecessary—appeal to those who feast on Christmas day to remember others who, but for timely charity must fast while they feast. We shall dine more comfortably possessing in thought those sacred words, and believing in their implied promise—"Inasmuch as ye have done to the least of these ye have done it unto Me."

The busy men and women of the world are they who have attained to greatness. Many such have endured hardships and practiced rigid economy to enable them to meet the demands of a large family and the greatest men this country has produced have been men who have labored with hands and brain, after acquiring a competency, remembering the years that are gone, admit that their working years were their happiest years.

A tickling cough, from any cause, is quickly stopped by Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure. And it is so thoroughly harmless and safe, that Dr. Shoop tells mothers everywhere to give it without hesitation even to very young babes. The wholesome green leaves and tender stems of a lung healing mountainous shrub, furnish the curative properties of Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure. It calms the cough, and heals the sore and sensative bronchial membranes. No opium, no chloroform, nothing harsh used to injure or suppress. simply a resinous plant extract, that helps to heal aching lungs. The Spaniards call this shrub which the Doctor uses, "The Sacred Herb." Demand Dr. Shoop's. Take no other. Sold by all dealers.

Yes, Christmas is drawing very near. Then let us with one hand tenderly cling to the old year while we stretch forth the other to greet the new. To some it has been a year of prosperity, to others, one of adversity and sorrow. As we look back over past events we cannot fail to note the absence of many that were with us a year ago. But now they are gone, been called home to return no more. This time last year they were planning a surprise for some one near and dear to them in the way of a Christmas present that would cause them to be remembered as the years roll on bringing the joyous Christmas time.

Undertakers Austin Brown and D. E. Bolden, who were at Monongah, W. Va., several days last wetk assisting in preparing the bodies of the unfortunate for burial who lost their lives in the mine explosion there on Friday night, the 6th inst., returned to Oakland on Thursday evening of last week. Messrs. Bolden and Brown were two of thirty or forty men engaged in this work, they being members of the night force of embalmers. The scenes enacted in the morgue where the bodies were prepared for burial, were beyond description, men and women being frantic in their endeavors to identify the bodies of the loved ones, many of whom failed in this respect, the remains in many instances being so disfigured and burned that it was utterly impossible. One body was identified by a bullet wound in the leg, another by a certain scar over the left eye, while many were recognized by fillings in the teeth.

A lady was heard to remark in an Oakland store one evening recently: "In the spring my husband is going to have a spraying fountain erected in our front yard to cool the hemisphere during the hot eveninga next summer." It will be a big contract.

RUNAWAY TRAIN ON 17-MILE GRADE.

Which Completely Demolished a Vacant Dwelling House Near Track.

The third runaway freight train on the Seventeen-Mile Grade within the past two or three years was that of the eastbound pick-up Monday afternoon, when eight cars of the train and a vacant dwelling house located at the east end of the Hitchcock tunnel, were completely demolished, the trainmen, with the exception of the fireman, who was slightly hurt by jumping from his engine, escaped uninjured.

The train, which was composed of about twenty cars, some of them being on the way to the repair shop at Keyser, West Va., became unmanageable at or near Swanton, located five miles down the grade and about an equal distance from the point where the train was wrecked. The trainmen, well aware of the danger they were in by remaining on the runaway cars, jumped, the engineer alone standing by his post. People who saw the train going down the grade have asserted that it was going at a rate exceeding a mile a minute. Passing through the tunnel the eighth car from the rear of the train left the rails and was followed by those behind it, plowing into a vacant house belonging to the railway company at the east end of the tunnel and reducing it, along with the cars, to kindling wood. Had anyone been residing in the house there is no possible way in which they could have escaped instant death.

The forward part of the train kept to the rails and after passing Bloomington station was gotten under control by the engineer, who reported the wreck to the railway officials. Wrecking crews were immediately sent to the scene of the wreck and the tracks were cleared about eight hours afterward, all trains being delayed that length of time.

Chicken Thieves Abroad.

Recently a number of hen roosts in Oakland have been robbed, the manner of procedure in each case being of such a nature as to indicate the work was done by the same individual. So far as we have learned the hen houses visited by the sneak thief are those of Rev. J. M. Davis, Stephen Nally and A. C. Whetsell. Last Thursday night the meat house at Charles B. Cropp's residence was broken into and four hams stolen.

JUDGE HOKE'S COURT

Some Law and Order as Dished Out at Sandy Bend.

THE CASE OF TWO TERRORS.

Being Guilty of Fooling With the Feelings of the Community, Rocky Mountain Jim and Kaw Valley Sam Are Fined $20 and Costs.

[Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.]

"This yere court having been opened in due and ancient form," said Judge Hoke of Sandy Bend as he laid down his pipe and assumed an air of dignity, "I want to present to this large and intelligent audience a moving picture. In the prisoners' box over thar you behold Rocky Mountain Jim and Kaw Valley Sam. They are nestled up to each other like a couple of lambs, and they look so humble and innocent that your hearts sorter go out to them.

"It was a week ago that they struck this town of Sandy Bend the same day, one coming from the east and the other from the west. Each came in with a whoop and a yell. Each announced himself a holy terror. They had guns and scalping knives. They had a thirst for gore. They had notches cut in the butts of their guns to show that they had killed twenty-seven critters apiece.

"When this yere court is not a court he is running the Red Dog saloon, as is known to you all. He knows a man when he sees one. He knows a holy terror from a tenderfoot. No one can say that he has ever seen him take water for any living thing. When he sizes up a new arrival what he says goes.

"When them two holy terrors arrived in town that day there was a commotion. We hadn't seen one for a year. I was called upon to size 'em up, and I went forth. I overhauled Rocky Mountain Jim and asked him to drink and counted the notches in his gun butts. I listened to his roar and saw him foam at the mouth, and I says to some of you, says I:

The Real Thing.

"'There's no discount on him. He's the real thing and no mistake. He's a cyclone on wheels and must be patted on the back or there'll be trouble.'

"Then I hunted up Kaw Valley Sam. I found him eating the raw meat of a steer just killed and trying to buy two acres of ground for a private graveyard. I listened to his growls and roars. I witnessed his handiness at drawing. I looked into his bloodshot eyes. Then I comes away and says to some of you fellers, says I:

"'It's the simon pure thing. It hasn't been whitewashed or gilded over. Look out for it. It's a real old fashioned holy terror of the kind of fifteen years ago. If it turns loose, the town will swim in blood.'

"And the rest of you took my size up as O. K., and the town of Sandy Bend proceeded to tremble in its boots. We've been a purty tuff crowd yere, but we've been losing our hold for the past five years. For three days them terrors held the town. They divided it between 'em and didn't meet. They told what they would do to each other in case they did meet, and their language made us shiver. We was willing to put up with sun spots and earthquakes and volcanoes all summer, but we prayed that them two terrors might not meet.

"On the fourth day some of us began to wonder why one of 'em didn't seek out the other and have the slaughter over with. Then we further wondered if one was afraid and the other dasn't. They continued to promenade around and whoop and yell and chank their teeth, but we went right ahead and put up a job to bring them together. This yere court, not as a court, but as an individual, was selected to work the racket. I hunted up Sam and patted him on the back and rubbed his bristles down and invited him to take a walk. I walked him along to the Blue Moon saloon and into it, and there he came face to face with Jim.

Whole Country Held Its Breath.

"For one long minit the country for forty miles around held its breath.

"For sixty seconds the mountains got ready to tremble and the rivers to run up hill.

"As them two holy terrors gazed into each other's faces we thought of hills composed of skeletons and lakes brimming over with blood. We breathed in gasps and stood on our tiptoes.

"Then what happened? If I ask the question with a quaver in my voice and tears in my eyes, don't blame me. Right then and there the reputation of old Wyoming was at stake for a hundred years to come. She was either to take a squat and declare the game off or stand up to her past record and win new medals of greatness.

"Did Rocky Mountain Jim and Kaw Valley Sam draw their guns and begin shooting?

"Did they stagger and fall and finish the rest of the fight with their knives? As they lay there dying of twenty wounds did they utter expressions to be recorded on the tablets of history?

"Not a dying! Not an utter! Not a tablet! Not a history! Not a durn thing!

"After a minute Jim reaches out his hand to Sam, and Sam accepts it and shakes.

"'I hain't mad,' says Jim.

"'Nor I,' says Sam.

"'Have one on me?'

"'I don't care if I do.'

"And then they took whisky together and never asked any other critter in that place if he had a mouth on him! Yes, sir—nestled right up together like two loving doves and patted each other on the back and told what awful fighters they was, and we stood there and looked on and realized what a blow had been struck at the reputation of Wyoming that would be known in the farthest recesses of Africa before another day had passed away. There was tears in my own eyes, and I saw them in others.

"Then we tiptoed out and held a little meeting in the Red Dog saloon. There were but few of us present, but we knew what ought to be done and what must be done to prevent a slump in real estate and prevent this community from becoming the laughing-stock of the world. We marched out in a solid body. We hunted up those holy terrors. We took their guns and knives away and trun 'em into the lock-up. Some of the boys was willing and ready to shed their blood in doing it, but there was no call. Rocky Mountain Jim laid down like a calf that has lost its mother, and Kaw Valley Sam wept and begged that he might have the privilege of getting out of town.

Bluffed by Two Men.

"There they are over there. Take a good look at them, and if they don't hide their heads in shame, which they don't, then we orter. The town of Sandy Bend has been bluffed by two men who hain't got the sand to face a coyote together!

"The town of Sandy Bend, which has seen fourteen dead men lying along its principal street as the sun came up in the morning, trembling in its boots before two yearling lambs!

"The town of Sandy Bend, which once declared that the whale really did swallow Joner and shot thirty men to prove it, going down into its boots before two critters who could have been stampeded at night by a bull calf!

"I have hunted up the law in the case, and I have found that there hain't no law about it. It was a big game of bluff, and the law is silent about bluffing. I shall therefore make a law. I declare them guilty of the crime of fooling with the feelings of a community that has allus stood ready to back up its opinions with its guns, and each one is fined $20 and costs. Their guns and knives will be taken away and sold for the benefit of the orphans, and any one who wants to expedite their leaving the town needn't stop to ask permission. I may be found in the crowd of expediters myself. If not, it will be because business at the Red Dog demands my presence and I feel that the case can safely be left in the hands of the patriots who have never failed their country when the test of true manhood came."

For a Friend

By Emma C. Dowd

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

As Helen Sargent stopped singing a sweet voice from the other end of the room said: "That is a beautiful song, dearie. It seemed as if I could see the Lord riding into Jerusalem, and the people casting their garments and palm branches before Him, and hear them crying, 'Hosanna!' You make it all so real."

"I am glad you like it, grandma. I feel as if I were there myself; perhaps that is why I can make it seem real to others. I am to sing it at church to-morrow and I hope it will please my audience as well as it pleases you. But not everybody is as kind a critic as you are." Then stooping to kiss the smiling lips she sped up-stairs.

The flush that her grandmother's words had called to her cheeks had not died out, and her face reflected the pure joy that filled her heart. Helen Sargent was very lovely as she stood there thinking her happy thoughts.

Presently she turned from the window and made preparations for a walk.

As she was ushered into the parlor of her friend, Mabel Emory, she saw that another caller was before her.

"Oh, it is Millie Crawford!" she said sweetly, as she went forward to greet the girl, who had turned slightly at her approach. "I have hardly caught a glimpse of you since I came home; but we used to be good friends before I went abroad. I wish I might see more of you. I never forget old friends, Millie."

The young lady thus addressed replied somewhat stiffly to this cordial greeting and then sat awkwardly on the edge of a large chair, nervously fingering the buttons of her jacket.

"What Ails Millie Crawford?"

"What ails Millie Crawford?" asked Helen as soon as she was alone with her friend.

Mabel blushed.

"Poor Millie!" she said; "she is going through a hard place."

"Oh, I did not suppose she was in trouble! I am so sorry. I wish I could help her."

Helen's voice was very tender and sympathetic, and she looked inquiringly at Mabel, expecting something further. But Mabel only seemed confused, and she avoided her friend's direct gaze.

"I'd like to tell you—that is, perhaps it would be best," she said, finally; "but I don't think Millie would want me to speak of it."

"Then do not," Helen hastened to say. "I only wish I might be of use to her in some way."

Mabel opened her lips, as if to reply; then she closed them tightly, with a pained expression, and the pain did not wholly leave her face during her caller's stay. This puzzled Helen not a little, for Mabel had always been so frank, and she found herself wondering if she could in any way be connected with Millie Crawford's trouble. Then she would put the thought from her as preposterous, and still it would come, again and again, till her mind was distraught and the perfect joy in her heart was gone. Her anxiety about the matter increased when, on the next day, she met Millie in the church vestibule, and at the instant she was about to bow Millie turned her head, as if she had not seen her; she felt sure that it was purposely done, yet why? Helen could not tell.

On Monday morning she started for Boston on business for her grandmother. As the train stopped at a way station, Helen looked up from her book to see a rosy-cheeked, smiling woman standing opposite her in the aisle, and she moved closer to the window and took up the parcel beside her that the stranger might share her seat.

"Thank you," said the woman; "I don't see what makes the cars so crowded this mornin'. But I don't blame 'em any; it's pleasant enough to want to be goin' somewhere."

Helen nodded a smiling assent, and then resumed her reading. But in a moment she felt a soft touch on her sleeve.

"Excuse me," said her seatmate, "but I couldn't help seein' that," pointing to the ticket that lay in Helen's lap, "an' I want to know if you live in Bloxamboro."

"Yes."

"I thought so! Wal, I'm real glad. Perhaps you know a young lady by the name of Crawford."

Helen responded in the affirmative.

"Wal, ain't I in luck! You see, I live in Boston. I've been over to my married daughter's to stay all night. Her baby has got the measles, an' they thought he was goin' to die sure, an' nothin' would do but I must come right over. But he's as bright as a button this mornin', an' there wa'n't no need o' my goin', only I s'pose Mary 'll feel easier now. Wal, that ain't here nor there. This Miss Crawford come to my house the other day to see about hirin' some rooms for herself an' mother, an' I felt a little shaky 'bout lettin' her have 'em, seein' I didn't know nothin' whether she was reliable or not; but if you say she is, why that settles it."

Upon hearing Helen's assurance that Miss Crawford and her mother would probably be all that could be desired as tenants, the woman went on:

"I s'pose I needn't be so fussy, but I hain't lived in Boston long enough to git used to city ways, an' I'm dretful afraid I shall git took in by somebody. I thought she was all right; she seemed so pretty appearin', an' I felt real sorry for her. You see, there's a rich girl there in Bloxamboro that's been playin' the mischief with her prospects, gittin' her music scholars away from her—or no, not gittin' 'em away 'xactly, 'cause she said she didn't b'lieve she had anything to do about it, only they thought 'twas tonier to take lessons o' this big bug that had been to Europe an' had got all the new fangled notions in singin'. An' she said she spent 'most all her mother's money learnin' how to sing, an' now it wa'n't goin' to be worth much to her after all. She cried when she was tellin' me, an' I felt awful sorry for her. Oh, an' she said she had a good place in the church choir, an' she was took down with typhoid fever just before this rich I-for-get-her-name come home, an'—as luck would have it—her time run out before she got well enough to sing, an' the other girl got married, an' so they up an' hired this rich girl—they'd got to have somebody, you see, an' she was all ready an' waitin'! But she said she could 'a' stood that if she could 'a' kep' her scholars; but all her best ones went over to the other one. It does seem as if anybody't had plenty o' money wouldn't do such things, don't it? But, there, p'rhaps you know that rich girl, too—my, I hope she ain't no friend o' yours! I never thought!"

How Helen Sargent managed to reassure her garrulous companion she hardly knew; but that the mind of the little woman was relieved of all fears was evident from the unsuspecting way in which she continued her innocent chatter about herself, her relatives, Millie Crawford and the things that made up the daily routine of her own uneventful life.

As for Helen, her brain whirled, her heart beat wildly, she felt suffocated. This, then, was the explanation of Millie's trouble, of Mabel's strange conduct—and she was the cause of it all!

Helen was glad when she bade the well-meaning little woman good-by, and she was once more left to herself. After attending to her grandmother's business she had expected to spend a few hours in shopping and paying two or three visits, but her interest in new gowns and her Boston friends was gone, and she took an early train for home.

In her own room she first dared to look at the matter squarely. It was all plain enough now, this trouble of Millie's. Mrs. Crawford was in poor health, probably not well enough to be left alone—that was why Millie had been looking for rooms in Boston. She recollected hearing Millie once say that she believed it would break her mother's heart if she should ever have to leave her own little home where she had gone as a bride, and which she loved so dearly.

Helen's form shook with suppressed sobs. She prayed and prayed for light and strength.

At last, the struggle was ended; Helen grew calm. She rose and made preparations for going down to tea. When she looked into the mirror to see if she could discover any traces of her recent tears, it was not an unhappy face that greeted her.

Two years afterwards she was returning home from Boston late one afternoon when she caught the earnest gaze of a woman across the aisle. The face had a familiar aspect, but before she could recollect where she had seen it the woman came toward her with outstretched hand.

"I do' know's you know me, but I hain't forgot you—oh, now you remember!" pleased at Helen's smile of recognition. "Wal, I've looked for you ever since. Do you know, that Miss Crawford didn't come after all, an' I never knew why till a little while ago. I met her an' she told me all about it. That rich girl went off travelin', an' so she got her place in the choir back again an' her scholars an' ev'rything! Wasn't that nice? An' that rich girl—why, she's turned out 'most an angel! She's got piles o' money of course, but 'tain't ev'rybody 'll do things for nothin' if they have. She's givin lessons all the time to poor girls that want to learn to sing an' can't afford to, an' she sings in prisons an' hospitals an' awful old tenement houses, an' they say she does sing beautiful. I'd just like to see her an' hear her sing; I'd walk five miles any time to do it! Oh, dear, here's Shirlton, and I've got to go! Won't you come an' see me sometime? I'm in the same old place. Queer, how things turn out, ain't it? Do come see me!" And Helen promised. Then the train stopped, and the nodding, smiling little woman disappeared in the crowd.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

FAITHFUL SERVICE.

Woman Who Has Been Sixty Years a Sunday School Teacher.

"In the teaching of a Bible class lies the secret of longevity and the maintaining of a youthful spirit with gray hairs," says Mrs. Mary A. Wright, who for nearly 60 years has been a teacher in the First Baptist Sunday school in Burlington, N. J. Mrs. Wright, who is now six years beyond the "three score and ten," took her first Bible class in the Baptist Sunday school in Burlington when but 16 years of age, and is still teaching, says Christian Herald. She joined the school when only eight and later, when she was given a class, the girls she taught were almost as old as herself. She continued for some time as an instructor of boys and girls; but in later years she has devoted herself to the teaching of adults, and her Bible class for women has long been the largest in the city. She is a remarkable little woman and her faithfulness and enthusiasm in her work have served as inspirations to the hundreds of younger teachers and scholars in the Sunday school, and to many others.

MRS. MARY A. WRIGHT.

She comes of a family many members of which were prominent as Bible teachers. Her father was a minister of the Gospel and her mother was one of the first teachers in the First Baptist Sunday school, organized in Burlington in 1825. Her husband, the late Noah E. Wright, was also an active Sunday school worker, and for 40 years was connected with the same school where his wife is still teaching, and where he himself was, for several terms, superintendent. Besides being a teacher, Mrs. Wright is prominent in mission work.

Teachers and officers of the Sunday school and members of Mrs. Wright's large Bible class tendered her a complimentary reception recently. Speaking of her career, Mrs. Wright says: "I have made many mistakes in life, but the teaching of the Bible is not a mistake. One would suppose that after so many years' study the Bible would grow old and uninteresting, but every time I read it I find something new. When I started as a Sunday school teacher I little thought that I would spend so long a time in the work, but had I my life to live over again I would still teach a Bible class. I will give you a recipe for keeping young. 'Teach a class in a Sunday school.'"

Mrs. Sage's Benefactions.

Mrs. Russell Sage continues her benefactions in ways that promise most salutary results. She has given $200,000 to enlarge the building for the naval branch of the Young Men's Christian association at the navy yard in Brooklyn. The existing building was presented by Miss Helen Gould and has accomplished a highly beneficent purpose. The structure is no longer adequate to the growing needs of the association, and the generosity of Mrs. Sage will meet an urgent want, says Troy Times. The jackies of the American navy, who are greatly profited by the provisions thus made for their comfort and pleasure, properly appreciate the work of these noble-minded women.

Rice Christians.

The Chinese missionaries call those natives who become converts for pecuniary motives "Rice Christians." There are 20 to 40 per cent of these. The missionaries are doing better and more successful work than they have ever done. The Chinese say that the missionaries have made more impression in the last ten years than in the previous 90. The medical and educational branches are especially praised. The Chinese, even of the highest classes, are grossly ignorant of the care of the health and cure of disease. Thus the missionaries have been able to perform wonders in the treatment of the sick.

A Hope of Reunion.

The Reformed church in France—the old Huguenot church—has been divided for many years into Orthodox and "Liberal" sections, with an antagonism so bitter that it has not been practicable to hold a meeting of the synod, and the breach has seemed to be widening up to nearly the present time. The situation had become critical in view of the operation of the separation law. A hope of reunion is at last held out by the results of a conference of representative members of both wings recently held at Jarnac to devise a declaration of principles upon which they might come together.

Elect Secretary.

Rev. Joseph Wilson Cochran, D. D., pastor of the Northminster Presbyterian church, Philadelphia, has been elected to the secretaryship of the board of education of the Presbyterian church in the U. S. A.

Van Dyke Stays at Princeton.

Dr. Henry van Dyke, urged by the faculty and students of Princeton college to withdraw his resignation, has reconsidered his decision, and will remain with the college.

Dancing All the Physical Exercise Woman Needs

By DR. ROBERTSON WALLACE.

It appears to be very generally taken for granted that the practice of athletics by woman is necessary for the physical salvation of the race. She is urged to go in for a bewildering variety of physical culture movements, active and passive forms of exercise, ball punching, lawn tennis, golf, cricket and hockey, with a view to preserving her own health, and preventing the degeneration of posterity. The modern woman is to save mankind by retrieving the fallen physique of the race. The white woman's burden is the cradle of humanity, which in future is to be filled only with the offspring of mothers who possess the beauty of Helen of Troy, the symmetry of Venus, the endurance of Diana, and the mental powers of Minerva. The future of mankind is to be assured by the immensity of the maternal muscular development and the child's grip on life to be fostered by dumb-bells and perfected with punch-balls.

So far as women are concerned, the methods of physical culture are being boomed just a trifle too loudly. Ever since Eve first stepped upon the planet women have done very well indeed. Primitive woman expanded her chest and contracted her biceps without the use of any apparatus, and from sheer force of necessity. Probably she jumped for joy and danced in rags just as her daughters do to this day. She had need to be fleet of foot to escape the attentions of undesirable saurians and ineligible suitors. In a word she got all the muscular exercise that was good for her. She practiced physical culture as H. Jourdain talked prose, without knowing it; and that her methods were quite satisfactory is proved by the enduring qualities of most of her progeny, many of whom are perhaps to their surprise, still extant.

The world has been made what it is, and history has been not only made but made possible by those great men whose names are familiar to every schoolboy. Those strong men who have carved the world into its present shape, and left the impress of their powerful personalities in every quarter of the rugged globe, were the children of mothers who, so far as we can ascertain, gave no particular heed to the scientific culture of their muscles, and neglected to take, I fear, a well-balanced diet.

I am often tempted to wonder what substitutes for the Ling exercises, or the different kinds of Home Exercisers, were devised by the strenuous mothers of Julius Caesar and Alexander the Great.

How is it that in what we are pleased to call the dark ages, when women were supposed to take no muscular exercise and almost to draw their breath only at a venture, the race did not degenerate and altogether die out? The truth of the matter is that human nature is the same to-day as it was when humanity first made its bow to the planet. There were as many light hearts in the dark ages as there are heavy hearts in the ages of light. Women's first step on this planet was taken, we feel sure to the music of the spheres. It was the first step in that dance which she was subsequently to lead all mankind. Woman's development began in a dance; it will be maintained and perfected by the dance, and it will end in a dance. In a word, dancing has been woman's chief delight since her feet first touched the springy turf in the dim beginnings of time. All the little mothers of great men ran, leaped, skipped and danced, as all but poor cripple children do to this day. Dancing is the one exercise most natural to, and last to be given up by, women. The grande dames of history were great because they danced.

No amount of lawn-tennis, golf, cricket, or hockey, however assiduously pursued by women, will make the race one iota stronger to-day than it has been in the past before athletics for women were dreamed of.

Man-Jury Swayed by Pretty Woman

By MAGISTRATE LEROY B. CRANE, New York City.

Are jurors swayed by psychological or physical influences in meting out justice in the case of a young and beautiful woman?

This is a question that has been brought to my mind of late, but it is in reality a subject as old as the thoughts of men.

How far are 12 men physically able to act as unbiased judges of facts where a weeping and attractive young woman is concerned? How far can they be trusted to render a fair and impartial verdict when she sits downcast at the bar of justice? I say the majority of jurors cannot be trusted at all.

The majority of men are liable to be swayed from facts where the sentimental side of life is shown. Whether a woman is attractive or not men are often inclined toward clemency with the fairer sex, especially when the prisoner has an appearance of trouble and care and when her history shows the burdens of life cast upon her.

In the case of pretty women jurors are physically unable to withstand the onslaught of a woman's smiles or tears.

The tendency of men toward women—physically, mentally, morally—is to act in her favor in a court of justice. It is only natural. There is some subtle physical influence which, I believe, in many cases creeps from the beautiful woman in distress at the bar and to the men sitting in judgment upon her. And, after all, it may be but the innate sense of chivalry. In America, at least, we hold our women so high that our first feeling is one of chivalrous desire to aid them.

In England, it is true there are few women acquitted or dealt leniently with in comparison with the number in America. The Englishman regards woman as a chattel; he is stirred by no generous, chivalrous impulse to aid her. On the other hand, he looks down upon woman to an extent that he would scarcely consider her rights at all.

The psychological significance of a woman's testimony upon American jurors is apt to be overrated by a casual reading of the testimony in the case. I am not psychologist enough to go into the details of these effects, but you have only to look up the number of acquittals of pretty and attractive women to realize that men jurors are loath to convict a beautiful woman, or, as far as that goes, any woman who shows sufficient signs of womanliness.

To state the subject too boldly may shock the sensibility of righteous men who have served as jurors and who consider themselves eligible to serve in that capacity. However, there is nothing for any one to take offense at the statement that the physical influence to some extent takes precedence over the mental.

THE MARYLAND LEGISLATURE.

Governor Warfield Preparing to Vacate the Executive Mansion.

"Many of the placeseekers will not wait for the gubernatorial plumbs," says a political writer in yesterday's Baltimore American.

"They intend to go for what there is in sight, and the members of the legislature, especially the senators, are already beset by constituents who want to be cared for at Annapolis. An Eastern Shore senator, who was in the city last week, said he had already received 19 applications from Democrats in his county, and if he does well he will only have two places at his disposal.

"While the inauguration is expected to attract a number of people to Annapolis, it is not thought the attendance will be unusually large. Cecil county will probably be better represented than any of the other counties, the home constituents of the incoming executive having signified their intention of giving him a send-off.

"The attorney general-elect will enter upon his duties next Thursday, when Mr. William Shepard Bryan, the incumbent will make a formal transfer.

Mr. Straus is to be sworn in by Governor Warfield and the ceremony will be devoid of any ostentation.

"Already preparations are being made by Governor Warfield for the removal from the executive mansion at Annapolis, and when next he votes it will be as a resident of Howard county. His successor then becomes by virtue of his residence at Annapolis a voter in Anne Arundel county and Cecil loses a Democrat.

"The coming session of the legislature is robbed of much of its interest, because the U. S. Senator is already as good as elected. The nomination of ex-Governor Smith by the Democratic caucus will be a mere formality. Politically, it will be the most harmonious session held in some years. The relations between the new executive and the Democratic members are expected to be most cordial, presenting a marked contrast to what they were two and four years ago. Governor Warfield was always treated respectfully by the members, but with few exceptions none had any use for him politically. The executive and legislative branches of the state government tolerated each other, but that was all. They were continually pulling in different directions.

"With a governor in hearty sympathy with the Democratic organization which, through its leaders will control legislation the work can be mapped out so that there need be no friction and whatever political legislation may be enacted, it will receive the approval of the executive.

"The most important action from a Democratic point of view will be the adoption of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, which is to disfranchise the bulk of the colored voters. A conference has been arranged for tomorrow at the instance of Mr. Isaac Lobe Straus, at which leading Democrats will be present and offer suggestions. The only members of the General Assembly invited are President Seth, of the Senate, and Senator Gorman. Whatever amendment these gentlemen may agree upon will be first submitted to a joint caucus, adopted and then put through both houses.

"Judge Crothers is understood to be prepared to sign any amendment that may be passed, even though the Court of Appeals has decided this is not necessary, and he will proclaim its submission to the people for ratification. The Democratic leaders profess to be very confident that the next time an amendment is submitted it will be adopted. They count upon a united party to vote for it. This matter is to be disposed of early in the session.

"Whatever changes may be made in the election will hardly affect the Wilson law counties. There is a disposition to retain the system employed in these until after the disfranchisement amendment has been carried, the idea being to continue to make it as difficult as possible for the negroes to vote when this proposition is to be voted on. In all other counties, as well as in Baltimore city, the law may be so changed as to be considered, and to invalidate only the vote for the candidate in that group in which the voter blundered.

"One of the most important measures affecting business corporations will be the bill now being framed by a commission of lawyers, of which Mr. Francis K. Carey is chairman. There is understood to be no opposition to this provisional and its passage is said to be assurred.

"The selection of desk officers will not be made until New Year's Eve, when the Democrats will hold a caucus."

Letter Delayed 151 Years.

There is an unbroken rule that the cellar of the Winchester (Mass.) post office shall be cleaned out once in every 150 years. The cleaner was not onto his job last year, because, if he had been, he would have found the letter addressed to E. S. Merrill, Winchendon, postmarked 1756, that M. J. McDonald discovered in the debris. The old postmark shows the cellar hasn't been cleaned out in 151 years.

Personal Recollections of a Dollar

I am a dollar. A little age worn, maybe, but still in circulation. I am proud of myself for being in circulation. I am no tomato can dollar—not I.

This town is only my adopted home, but I like it and hope to remain permanently. When I came out of the mint I was adopted into a town like this in another state. But after a time I was sent off to a big city, many miles away. I turned up in a Mail Order house. For several years I stayed in that city. Millionaires bought cigars with me. I didn't like that, for I believe in the plain people.

Finally a traveling man brought me to this town and left me here. I was so glad to get back to a smaller town that I determined to make desperate efforts to stay.

One day a citizen of this town was about to send me back to that big city. I caught him looking over a Mail Order Catalogue. Suddenly I found my voice and said to him—he was a dentist, by the way:

"Now, look here, doc. If you'll only let me stay in this town I'll circulate around and do you lots of good. You buy a big beefsteak with me, and the butcher will buy groceries, and the grocer will buy dry goods, and the dry goods merchant will pay his doctor's bill with me, and the doctor will spend me with a farmer for oats to feed his buggy horse, and the farmer will buy some fresh beef from the butcher, and the butcher will come around to you and get his tooth mended. In the long run, as you see, I'll be more useful to you here at home than if you'd send me away forever."

Doc said it was a mighty stiff argument. He hadn't looked at it in that light before. So he went and bought the big beefsteak, and I began to circulate around home again.

Now, just suppose all the other dollars that are sent to Chicago or some other big city were kept circulating right here at home. You could see this town grow.

HONEST, NOW—AIN'T I RIGHT?

THE TEDDY BEARS' CHRISTMAS TREE

BOY FATALLY SHOT.

Edward Flaherty, Aged 14 Years, Died of Gunshot Wound.

Edward Flaherty, aged fourteen years, son of Mrs. Bridget Flaherty, of Hutton, died at the home of his mother Monday morning as the result of a gunshot wound accidentally inflicted by his cousin, Martin Carney, a lad of about the same age as young Flaherty

The two boys went out Saturday morning for the purpose of hunting rabbits, Flaherty being in the lead and his cousin immediately behind him carrying the gun. By some manner the gun was discharged the entire contents entering Flaherty's back immediately below his kidneys.

The wounded boy was taken to his home and Dr. Legge of Oakland, was summoned who responded and made the boy as comfortable as possible, the physician knowing that the wound was necessarily fatal. He lingered until Monday, as above stated, when he was released from his sufferings.

The youth was a member of St. Peter's Catholic church in Oakland, from which edifice his funeral will occur on Thursday morning of this week.

SAW MANY GOOD HIGHWAYS ABROAD.

Dr. William Bullock Clark Found European Roads to be Excellent.

Prof. William Bullock Clark, chief of the State Geological Survey, which has charge of the building of the State roads in Maryland, has just returned from a three month's trip in Europe, where he examined the State highways in the countries which he visited, Professor Clark says:

"I landed in Naples early in August and drove extensively over the Italian State roads about Naples, Rome, and Florence, as well as later in Northern Italy on my way to the Dolomites of the Tyrol. The roads everywhere were made of crushed stone in accordance with the most modern methods of highway construction.

"The Italian Government has spent large sums on all its highways and one is greatly impressed with the attention which has been given to the establishment of low grades and to the protection of the highways by the construction of substantial side walls, bridges and culverts. The people everywhere demand hard and smooth roadways, with reduced grades in order that their products may be readily transported to market. This system of modern highways has been largely developed within the last 20 or 30 years, although many of the earlier roads were excellent.

"In Austria I drove between 200 and 300 miles across the Dolomite mountains and beyond the eastern border of Switzerland. Here the Tyroles Government has built an elaborate system of modern highways, which have been carried by easy grades over the high Alpine passes, and afforded everywhere a ready means of communication between the towns and villages of that mountainous country. In many cases the roadbed has been secured by blasting away great masses of rock along the mountain slopes and often by extensive fills and costly bridges. As in the case of Italy, the people of this mountainous country have in late years demanded and have been given by Government as complete a system of highways as can be found anywhere in Northern or Western Europe.

"Leaving Eastern Switzerland, I spent several days driving through the Bavarian mountians on my way to Munich, and here, too, the Government has constructed the same type of splendid stone highways which I had previously found. Throughout Germany the subordinate roads as well as the main ones have been graded and macadamized, so that one may travel anywhere without encountering a bad piece of public highway.

"Later in the summer I spent a week automobiling with some friends in the region to the west of Paris, traveling several hundred miles through the chateau country of the valley of the Loire. Every bad grade has been eliminated on both the main and the subordinate highways, and the stone surfaces are as smooth as a billiard table. We often passed the State highway construction forces, and now and then saw the full equipment of steam roller, construction and living car, and sprinkler on its way from one place of work to another. The highways everywhere are lined with small piles of stone and screenings, which are applied to the roads whenever slight depressions develop and then smoothly rolled by the steam rollers. The roads in this way are kept in perfect condition, and small depressions which might develop into serious injury to the public highways are never allowed to remain long without attention.

"The same type of highway was again encountered in England, where I found that the same methods were pursued. In making inquiry regarding cost of construction I found that the crushed stone cost as much lain upon the road in England as it does with us, although some of the other expenses, due to the low price of labor, were somewhat less.

"Everywhere iu Evrope great attenis given to the perfecting of a complete system of smooth public highways of easy grades. Even the poorest country or province considers the building of the best possible roads to be in the long run the most economical policy. The work is done everywhere under engineering supervision and in accordance with the most carefully drawn specifications. No haphazard method of road construction is tolerated there, as it is in so many of our American communities. It is recognized everywhere that a bad location or improper construction results in a waste of public money. The systems and methods of road construction pursued in every country country which I visited would be a revelation to anyone who is not familiar with the history of State road construction.

"We have made great strides here in Maryland in the last few years, and I believe it will not be many years before we shall be able to develope the same system of public highways that are found today everywhere in Western Europe. There is no American State that is not today far better able to meet the expenditure for such a system of public roads than many of the European countries which have them. The latter have long since recognized the fact that the greatest economy in the long run in a system of smooth, hard public highways of easy grade.

"Some of our American States have already awakened to the importance of road construction, especially Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey and New York, the latter State having recently provided for a system of public roads that will cost when completed $50,000,000, and this amount has already been provided by the Legislature.

"Maryland is well in the forefront of this progressive movement, and already, under the survey some 75 miles of modern highways have been completed. Out of the 16,000 miles of public road mileage it is imperative that 1,800 miles should be properly graded and macadamized. These, when completed, will afford a connecting system of main public roads reaching all important towns and shipping centers of the State.

"It is evident, if the work is to be completed within a reasonable time, that the people of the State should support the present system of work by accepting in each county the cooperation which the State Geological Survey is anxious to give under the provisions of the Shoemaker Act. The sum of $200,000 is available if the counties will come forward with the same amount. At the precent time less than this amount is annually used, a condition that has prevailed in many of the other States until the beneficial results of the work were apparent to the people."

NEW PHASES OF AN OLD PROBLEM

History has been made to a great extent by the movements of great bodies of people from one place to another, for purpose of settlement or conquest, but no phase of the question of ebb and flow of population has ever been more interesting than that which is presented to thoughful students of the movement at the present time. For years the people of the United States have watched with wonder the figures showing the increase in immigration, and the more timid have been filled with grave misgivings as to the results of this great wave of human beings which apparently rose higher and higher every year. Now, for the first time, we have an opportunity to study the problem from a different point of view.

But for the sudden check upon our business a few weeks ago it is quite probable that no attention would have been paid to the larger but practically unnoticed movement of foreigners from this country back to those lands from which they came. The people of America have noted that a million aliens were landed on our shores every twelve months and assumed that this meant an addition of that number of individuals to our populations. This seems to be very far from the truth. In fact, from the best sources available, it appears that the movement from our shores this year will mount up to the enormous total of between four and five hundred thousand, and while this is exceptional there can be little doubt that the real increase in the population of the United States through immigration has been some hundreds of thousands less every year than would appear on the surface to be the case.

In times past we have been told that foreign countries lamented the departure from their shores of so many of the best workmen, entailing a great economic loss to these countrtes. Yet the unparalleled movement in this country to the home land seems to have created a problem far greatet than that which resulted when the movement was to and not from the United States. Reports from Italy especially indicated that the task of finding employment or otherwise providing for one or two hundred thousand returning emigrants is a gigantic one, and the local authorities are alarmed at the possible effect it may have upon conditions there. Austria Hungary, too, has noted the swing of the pendulum, and there has been a remarkable rise in the value of realty throughout the empire as a result of the demand by natives returning to their old homes. This rise in value, of course, has not been to the advantage of the poor man, and with the labor market glutted by men returning from America the situation is so serious as to cause grave concern to the government.

In this country the great employers of foreign labor have begun to do a little thinking along a different line. The foreign workmen have not given the full worth of the money paid them is not intimated, but it is said that the independent coke operators in Pittsburg and Connellsville have arrived at the apparently paradoxical decision that it is possible to decrease the cost of producing coke by increasing the pay of the workmen. That is, they figure that by employing none but American born or naturalized citizens. and paying them higher wages, they may, because of the superiority of the Americans, decrease the cost of production.

The difference between the value of the American and that of the Latin to the community is brought out in an interesting manner. It is shown that where an American and a foreigner are employed together, each receiving $85 a month, said to be the average wages paid to the eighty thousand men in the employ of the independents and the Steel Corporation, the foreigner puts back into circulation about $20 a month, living in squalor and sendfng the greater part of his earnings out of the country, while the American workman returns to the community every dollar he draws, not necessarily by squandering it, but by maintaining a higher standard of living, deposits in the local banks and investment in homes or other property.

Whether any permanent change will be brought about by an apparent change in the view of so large employers of foreign labor as those mentioned and by an awakening interest in all phases of the immigration problem as presented to us under the peculiar conditions brought about during the last few weeks remains to be seen; but the situation is an interesting one from what ever angle it is looked upon, and it is not impossible that its bearing on the future will be of a decidedly marked nature.

APPALLING IS MINE DEATH LIST

In 1906 Alone 2,061 Were Killed and 4,800 Hurt.

In a bulletin issued by the Geological Survey, entitled "Coal Mine Accidents, Their Causes and Prevention," figures are given to to show that the coal mines of the United States are causing the death of three times as many men per 1,000 employes as the coal mines of European countries.

In the last seventeen years 22,840 men have died in American coal mines. In 1906 alone, 2,061 men were killed and 4,800 injured. In the present month nearly 800 lives have been lost in four mines in this country.

The bulletin is the result of direction issued by Secretary of the Interior Garfield to investigate the nature and extent of mine accidents. John A. Holmes, Clarence Hale and Walter O. Snelling, of the Geological Survey, made the investigation. Dr. Holmes, in summing up the situation, says:

"The figures given in this report indicate that during the year 1906 nearly 7,000 men were killed or injured in the coal mines of this country, and that the number of the accidents caused directly or indirectly by mine explosions has been steadily increasing. It is also indicated that this increase has been due in part to lack of proper and enforcable mine regulations; in part to the lack of reliable information concerning the explosives used safely in the presence of the gas and dust encountered in the mines, and in part to the fact that in the development of coal mining not only is the number of miners increasing, but many areas from which coal is being taken are either deeper or farther from the entrance where good ventilation is more difficult, and the dangerous accumulations of explosive gas more frequent.

The report adds that "the increase both in the number and seriousness of mine explosions in the United States during past years may be expected to continue unless, through investigations made in the United States such as have proved effective in other coal producting countries, information can be obtained and published concernlng the explosives used, the conditions under which they may be used safely in the presence of coal dust or gas, and the general conditions which make for health and safety in coal mining operations."

PRESIDENT DIAZ AND HIS CABINET

Their Impressive Appearance Upon The Occasion of Secretary Root's Visit.

One of the most thrilling and salient moments which Mr. Root experienced in Mexico was the impressive entrance of President Diaz upon the occasion of a gala performance at the opera given in honor of the American Secretary of State. The glittering auditorium and boxes were crowded with the distinguished and fashionable people of the capital city. When General Diaz entered the Presidential box, moving forward unattended to his seat, he presented so brave, so strong, so indomitable a figure that a noticeable thrill pervaded the vast assemblage, only to be followed by a spontaneous outburst of affectionate greeting, the quality and earnestness of which I never before saw given to any other leader of men.

Surely President Diaz never looked more like one's ideal of a great and unselfish man, a hero, a statesman, a soldier, and a patriot, than he looked upon this night when he came to the opera to do honor to Mr. Root. He seemed the embodiment of mental alertness, physical strength, a fountain of reserve force and energy, a master mind dominated by an indomitable spirit.

I think it probable historians will agree that the New World up to the present moment has not produced a more efficient ruler than General Diaz. Those who have keen and just appreciation derived from practical knowledge of the difficulties and magnitude of the task which has confronted him for twenty years or more will understand why thoughtful students will be inclined to assign President Diaz a very lofty place in the annals of his time.

It is not by any means on account of his material successes that intelligent persons award to General Diaz the meed of greatness. It is true that he has turned a poor and impoverished, feeble, struggling weakly amalgamated republic into a strongly knitted, prosperous, happy republic But his great victory, the crowning and memorable success of his career, is to be found in the fact that throughout the length and breadth of Mexico he has drilled into the hearts and minds and lives of his people an earnest and abiding desire for peace and loyalty to law.

President Diaz is so great a man that he is perfectly willing to surround himself with strong men. In his cabinet are many men of uncommon ability. He brought to the office of Vice President Ramon Corral, a man of high character, wide influence and first-rate administrative capacity.

His Minister of Finance, Mr. Limantour, has real genius for his work and has done for Mexico's credit what Alexander Hamilton did for that of the United States.

I think students of finance will bear me out in the statement that in all the cabinets of the world there is not a stronger, abler, better, more efficient financial secretary than Mr. Limantour.

The Minister of Fomento, Mr. Molina, seems admirably fitted for the serious duties of his office, which, in a growing, progressive country, are of the highest importance, for he has to do with all the measures of progress and improvement

Senor Fernandez, a distinguished engineer, is at the head of the Department of Public Works.

Senor Marsical, well and favorably known for a score of years in every capital of the world, conducts the affairs of the foreign office with ability and discretion.

It will be observed that all, or nearly all, of President Diaz's closest friends and advisers are men upward of 60 years of age. He has, of course, many younger men in positions of importance and power, but, like the Japanese, he believes in confiding the truly momentous, intimate questions of policy to the "elder statesmen."

To remain in President Diaz's confidence and counsel a man must be honest, loyal and intelligent. He demands and is able to secure men possessing these qualities. No matter how big, how talented and resourceful those about him may be, President Diaz, by sheer force of his character, dominates all situations at all times.—J. B. Lomas, in Harper's Weekly.

Death In The Mines

News of another coal mining disaster in Pennsylvania came on the very day of the publication of the report of the Department of the Interior on such disasters and their causes. The Connellsville explosion Thursday, in which the lives of many miners were sacrificed, resembles in its causes and the extent of its damage the explosion at Monongah, W. Va., and that on Monday at Yolande, Ala.

Mr. Holmes, chief of the technical branch of the Interior Department, in commenting on the loss of nearly 23,000 lives through mine explosions in less than 18 years, says that the increase of such disasters is due to lack of proper regulations, ignorance and carelessness—for though his words are more polite that is what they mean.

Coal mining has been largely developed of late and the number of men employed in the mines greatly increased. The Monongah and Connellsville disaster could surely have been prevented. In European coal producing countries legislation for safeguarding the lives of miners has proved effective, and three such disasters as we have had within a fortnight will probably induce the mine owners to consider the need of stricter precautions.

THE FIST FIGHT IN THE HOUSE.

Details of The Clash of Williams and De Armond.

John Sharp Williams and David Albaugh De Armond, Southern gentlemen who occupy the minority places on the Committee on Rules in the House and who never have found any subject upon which they can agree, met in a rough-and-tumble fist fight on the floor of the House Thursday afternoon.

As a result Williams carries a crimson crescent, set in thunder hues, under his left eye, made by the long thunb-nail of De Armond's study right, while De Armond has a red spot on the bridge of his nose which bears a striking resemblance to the service mark of liquid absorption.

The encounter was witnessed by more than a hundred members of the House and by as many persons in the galleries, among them a score of women. While the battle lasted the excited spectators aloft pressed against the railing. Men and women leaned far over, holding their breadth as blow after blow was struck and returned and the combatants lunged forward and swayed back.

The fight came about over a committee assignment. Both men agree on this. In fact, they told such similar stories afterward that all marveled at the lie being passed. But it was by De Armond, and it was loudly emphasized by the word "damned."

The trouble, it is said, was caused by assigning Representative Books of Missouri to the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures, instead of to the Committee on the Census. De Armond asked to see Williams about the matter after the committee assignments were made public, and the two men talked in low tones for fully ten minutes. No attention was paid to them. Suddenly De Armond called out:

"I believe yon are a damned liar."

Both men were then standing. Like a flash Williams' right shot out and landed squarely on the Missourian's nose. De Armond staggered against a row of desks, and Williams got in a scorching wallop with his left on the jaw before his antagonist could recover. De Armond, who is wiry and plucky, soon got his bearings, and landed a corkscrew blow with his right, making a red line, like a sausage trade mark, on Williams' forehead.

Williams grabbed De Armond, swung him around and drove another right, aimed for the eyes, but landing on the ear. De Armond showed himself a regular tiger cat when it came to fighting in a clinch. He reached out with his right claw, grabbed at Williams' eyes and stuck his nicely sharpened thumb nail so deep into the Missippian's face that later all the spare handkerchiefs in the House and a half pint of listerine were required to stop the flow of blood.

All this happened before those sitting near by could get to the contestants. Carlin of Virginia, Bartlett of Georgia and Lever of South Carolina grabbed Williams, while Kimball of Kentucky and the World correspondent tugged at De Armond. The two men were hugging and slugging at close range, and separating them was no easy task.

Williams broke away for a second, and, crying "Damn it, give me another chance at him!" drove a corking right into De Armond's chest. The Missourian had one arm free, but his foot work was not of the best, and Williams was once more dragged away before the retaliatory blow could be landed. For a few seconds the two men glared at each other, then they were led away in opposite directions to the cloakroom.

Both said they regretted the fight, and each gave his version of the trouble.

The strained relations between Williams and De Armond are of several years standing. For several Congresses De Armond has been a candidate against Williams for the minority leadership, but always has resigned at least two weeks before the actual convening. Of the two, Williams is much the more popular. At the conclusion of the fight yesterday afternoon Democrats and Republicans alike swarmed around Williams, congratulating him upon his forbearance and followed him into the room, where he went to have the wound under his eye treated. Only one Congressman went up to De Armond. The others around him were newspaper men.

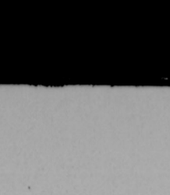
LIGHTS FROM RELIGIOUS FIELDS

A BEAUTIFUL CHAPEL.

Columbia University Gets Special Building for Religious Activities.



Columbia University, New York city, has just dedicated one of the most beautiful chapels in America as the center of the religious life of the students. Never until now has the university had a special building set apart for religious worship. The new structure is situated at the eastern side of the library, in a position to correspond with Earl Hall, and is in many respects unique in its architecture and construction. An attempt has been made to erect a building whose exterior shall harmonize with the surrounding college buildings, and yet to impart a tone of age to its appearance.

The material is overburned or Harvard brick and Indiana limestone. The style is of the north Italian architecture of the fifteenth century. The interior is of Norman brick, and it is said that this building is the first one where the tiling and brick remain uncovered. The effect is of unusual warmth and harmony of color. Every visible architectural line counts in the construction. The size of the building is a surprise, as the spring of the dome gives an idea of space not appreciated from the outside view. The chapel is of cruciform plan, with a seating capacity of about 1,200. No seats are to be built on the floor, however, and the exquisite mosaic will be left in unconcealed beauty. Seats are built in the transept galleries, explains, Christian Herald, and, when occasion demands, chairs will be arranged on the floor, as in the cathedrals abroad.

Sixteen memorial windows by Maitland Armstrong are let into the walls of the dome, while the chancel is glorious with three stained glass windows by La Farge, representing Paul preaching on Mars' Hill.

MORE STUDENTS THAN ROOM.

Work of the Union Theological Seminary of China.

Under the auspices of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian mission in mid-China this seminary was opened in October last with over 20 pupils, with more to come. Rev. J. C. Garrett writes:

"We are already unable to give room to all who desire to come to us. If the church at home will give her missionaries the facilities for training men for the gospel ministry, the men will be forthcoming. There are not as many as we need; there are few of the best educated and more talented seeking this work; there is no inducement whatever toward the miniathry as a profession, as compared with teaching, business, official or public employment, etc. But there are young men in the church who hear a call to the ministry; and if we do our share in the preparation of these men, we shall have done the most effective mission work possible at this important crisis."

Recreation for Canal Workers.

The government, realizing the importance of having clean and wholesome amusemnt for the men at work on the Panama canal zone, has agreed to back up the social work of the international committee of the Young Men's Christian associations along the canal. Mr. A. Bruce Minear has been working in Panama for some time, and the association has just dispatched four other trained and experienced men to his aid—Messrs. W. H. Baxley, J. F. McTyier, M. J. Stickel and R. R. Wolf. All of these will be placed on the pay roll of the government. Four club houses have been already erected and four more will soon be put up. Those now ready for use are located at Culebra, Empire, Cristobal and Gorgona.

An Encouraging Outlook.

The Rev. S. R. Smith, of the Niger mission of the English Church Missionary society, writes from Onitsha, West Africa: "The possibilities of work in this district are enormous, and every week I am receiving deputations asking for teachers from towns which were once a terror to their neighborhood. I am sure that the millions of Ibo-speaking people have a great future before them, especially if they can be induced to turn their attention to the development of the soul. During the past four months there have been over 150 adult baptisms and there are many more ready to be baptized."

The Main Lesson.

A minister was questioning his Sunday school concerning the story of Eutychus, the young man who, listening to the preaching of the Apostle Paul, fell asleep, and falling out of a window, was taken up dead.

"What," he asked, "do we learn from this solemn event?"

The reply from a little girl came:

"Please, sir, ministers should learn not to preach too long sermons."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The Last Stand.

It was shortly after two o'clock in the afternoon when that compact column of cavalrymen moved silently forward down the concealing coulee toward the more open ground beyond. Custer's plan was surprise, the sudden smiting of that village in the valley from the rear by the quick charge of his horsemen. From man to man the whispered purpose travelled down the ranks, the eager troopers greeting the welcome message with kindling eyes. It was the old way of the Seventh, and they knew it well.

With Custer riding at the head of the column, and only a little to the rear of the advance scouts, his adjutant Cook, together with a volunteer aide, beside him, the five depleted troops filed resolutely forward, dreaming not of possible defeat. Suddenly distant shots were heard far off to their left and rear, and deepening into a rumble, evidencing a warm engagement. The interested troopers lifted their heads, listening intently, while eager whispers ran from man to man along the closed files.

"Reno is going in, boys; it will be our turn next."

"Close up! Quiet there, lads, quiet," officer after officer passed the word of command.

Yet there were those among them who felt a strange dread—that firing sounded so far up the stream from where Reno should have been by that time. Still it might be that those overhanging bluffs would muffle and deflect the reports. All about them hovered death in dreadful guise. None among them saw those cruel, spying eyes watching from distant ridges, peering at them from concealed ravines; none marked the rapidly massing hordes, hideous in war-paint, crowded into near-by coulees and behind protecting hills.

It burst upon them with wild yells. The gloomy ridges blazed into their startled faces, the dark ravines hurled at them skurrying horsemen, while, wherever their eyes turned, they beheld savage forms leaping forth from hill and coulee, gulch and rock shadow. Horses fell, or ran about neighing; men flung up their hands and died in that first awful minute of consternation, and the little column seemed to shrivel away as if consumed by the flame which struck it, front and flank and rear. It was as if those men had ridden into the mouth of hell.

Yet it was scarcely for more than a minute. Men trained, strong, clear of brain, were in those stricken lines—men who had seen Indian battle before. The recoil came, swift as had been the surprise. Voice after voice rang out old familiar orders, steadying instantly the startled nerves; discipline conquered disorder, and the shattered column rolled out, as if by magic, into the semblance of a battle line.

It was magnificently done. Custer and his troop commanders brought their sorely smitten men into a position of defense, even hurled them cheering forward in short, swift charges, so as to clear the front and gain room in which to deploy. Out of confusion emerged discipline, confidence, esprit de corps.

Safe beyond the range of the troopers' light carbines, the Indians, with their heavier rifles, kept hurling a constant storm of lead, hugging the gullies, and spreading out until there was no rear toward which the harassed cavalrymen could turn for safety. One by one, continually under a heavy fire, the scattered troops were formed into something more nearly resembling a battle line—Calhoun on the left, then Keogh, Smith and Yates, with Tom Custer holding the extreme right. Thus they waited grimly for the next assault.

Nor was it long delayed. Scarcely had the troopers recovered, refilled their depleted cartridge belts from those of their dead comrades, when the onslaught came. The soldiers waited their coming. The short, brown-barrelled carbines gleamed at the level in the sunlight, and then belched forth their message of flame into the very faces of those reckless horsemen. It was not in flesh and blood to bear such a blow. With screams of rage, the red braves swerved to left and right, leaving many a dark, war-bedecked figure lying dead behind them, and many a riderless pony skurrying over the prairie. Exultant over their seemingly successful repulse, the men flung themselves again upon the earth, their cheers ringing out above the thud of retreating hoofs.

"We can hold them here, boys, until Reno comes," they shouted to each other.

The skulking red riflemen crept ever closer behind the ridges, driving their deadly missiles into those ranks exposed in the open. To the command of the bugle they discharged two roaring volleys from their carbines, hopeful that the combined sound might reach the ears of the lagging Reno. They were hopeful yet, although one troop had only a sergeant left in command, and the dead bodies of their comrades strewed the plain.

It was four o'clock. For two long hours they had been engaged in ceaseless struggle, and now barely a hundred men, smoke begrimed, thirsty, bleeding, half their carbines empty, they still formed an impenetrable ring around their chief. The struggle was over, and they realized the fact. When that wave of savage horsemen swept forth again it would be to ride them down, to crush them under their horses' pounding hoofs.

Like a whirlwind those red demons came—howling wolves, now certain of their prey. On both flanks of the short, slender line struck Gall and Crazy Horse, while like a thunderbolt Crow-King and Rain-in-the-Face attacked the center. These three storms converged at the foot of the hill, crushing the little band of troopers. With ammunition gone, the helpless victims could meet that mighty onrushing torrent only with clubbed guns, for one instant of desperate struggle. Shoulder to shoulder, in ever-contracting circle, officers and men stood shielding their commander to the last. Twenty or 30 made a despairing dash, in a vain endeavor to burst through the red enveloping lines, only to be tomahawked or shot; but the most remained, a thin struggling ring, with Custer in its center. Then came the inevitable end. The red waves surged completely across the crest, no white man left alive upon the field. They had fought a good fight; they had kept the faith.

Two days later, having relieved Reno from his unpleasant predicament in the valley, Terry's and Gibbons's infantry tramped up the ravine, and emerged upon the stricken field. In lines of motionless dead they read the fearful story; and there they found that man we know. Lying upon a bed of emptied cartridge shells, his body riddled with shot and mutilated with knives, his clothing torn to rags, his hands grasped a smashed and twisted carbine, his lips smiling even in death, was that soldier whom the Seventh had disowned and cast out, but who had come back to defend its chief and to die for its honor—Robert Hampton Nolan.

CHAPTER XXXV.

The Curtain Falls.

Bronzed by months of scouting on those northern plains, a graver, older look upon his face, and the bars of a captain gracing the shoulders of his new cavalry jacket, Donald Brant trotted down the stage road bordering the Bear Water, his heart alternating between hope and dread.

The familiar yellow house at the cross-roads appeared so unattractive as to suggest the thought that Naida must have been inexpressibly lonely during those months of waiting. He knocked at the sun-warped door. Without delay it was flung open, and a vision of flushed face and snowy drapery confronted him.

"Why, Lieut. Brant! I was never more surprised in my life. Do, pray, come right in. Yes, Naida is here, and I will have her sent for at once. Oh, Howard, this is Lieut. Brant, just back from his awful Indian fighting. How very nice that he should happen to arrive just at this time, isn't it?"

The young officer silently accepted Mr. Wynkoop's extended hand, and found a convenient chair, as Miss Spencer hastened from the room to announce his arrival.

"Why 'just at this time?'" he questioned.

Mr. Wynkoop cleared his throat. "Why—why, you see, we are to be married this evening—Miss Spencer and myself. We shall be so delighted to have you witness the ceremony. It is to take place at the church, and my people insist upon making quite an affair out of the occasion—Phoebe is so popular, you know."

The lady again bustled in, her eyes glowing with enthusiasm. "Why, I think it is perfectly delightful. Don't you, Howard? Now Lieut. Brant and Naida can stand up with us. You will, won't you, Lieutenant?"

"That must be left entirely with Naida for decision," he replied, soberly.

There was a rustle at the inner door, and Naida stood there. Their eyes met, and the color mounted swiftly to the girl's cheeks. Then he stepped resolutely forward, forgetful of all other presence, and clasped her hand in both his own. Neither spoke a word, yet each understood something of what was in the heart of the other.

"Will you walk outside with me?" he asked, at last. "I have much to say which I am sure you would rather hear alone."

She bent her head, and with a brief word of explanation to the others, the young officer conducted her forth into the bright July sunshine. They walked in silence side by side along the bank of the little stream. Brant glanced furtively toward the sweet, girlish face. Then he spoke.

"Naida," he said, gravely, "I have come back, as I said I would, and surely I read welcome in your eyes?"

"Yes."

"And I have come to say that there is no longer any shadow of the dead between us."

She looked up quickly, her hands clasped, her cheeks flushing. "Are you sure? Perhaps you misunderstand; perhaps you mistake my meaning."

"I know it all," he answered, soberly, "from the lips of Hampton."

"You have seen him? Oh, Lieut. Brant, please tell me the whole truth. I have missed him so much, and since the day he rode away to Cheyenne not one word to explain his absence has come back to me. You cannot understand what this means, how much he has become to me through years of kindness."

"You have heard nothing?"

"Not a word."

Brant drew a long, deep breath. He had supposed she knew this. At last he said gravely: "Naida, the truth will prove the kindest message, I think. He died in that unbroken ring of defenders clustered about Gen. Custer on the bluffs of the Little Big Horn."

Her slight figure trembled so violently that he held her close within his arms.

"There was a smile upon his face when we found him. He performed his full duty, Naida, and died as became a soldier and a gentleman."

"But—but, this cannot be! I saw the published list; his name was not among them."

"The man who fell was Robert Nolan."

Gently he drew her down to a seat upon the soft turf of the bank. She looked up at him helplessly, her mind seemingly dazed, her eyes yet filled with doubt.

"Robert Nolan? My father?"

He bent over toward her, pressing his lips to her hair and stroking it tenderly with his hand.

"Yes, Naida, darling; it was truly Robert Hampton Nolan who died in battle, in the ranks of his old regiment—died as he would have chosen to die, thank God! completely cleared of every stain upon his honor. Sit up, little girl, and listen while I tell you. There is in the story no word which does not reflect nobility upon the soldier's daughter."

She uplifted her white face. "Tell me," she said, simply, "all you know."

He recounted to her slowly, carefully, the details of that desperate journey northward, of their providential meeting on the Little Big Horn, of the papers left in his charge, of

He Held Her Close Within His Arms.

Hampton's riding forward with dispatches, and of his death at Custer's side. While he spoke, the girl scarcely moved; her breath came in sobs and her hands clasped his.

"These are the papers, Naida. I opened the envelope as directed, and found deeds to certain properties, including the mine in the Black Range; a will, duly signed and attested, naming you as his sole heir, together with a carefully prepared letter, addressed to you, giving a full account of the crime of which he was convicted, as well as some other matters of a personal nature. That letter you must read alone as his last message, but the truth of all he says has since been proved."

She glanced up at him quickly. "By Murphy?"

"Yes, by Murphy, who is now lying in the hospital at Bethune, slowly recovering. His sworn deposition has been forwarded to the department at Washington, and will undoubtedly result in the honorable replacing of your father's name on the army list. I will tell you briefly the man's confession, together with the few additional facts necessary to make it clear.

"Your father and mine were for many years friends and army comrades. They saw service together during the great war, and afterward upon the plains in Indian campaigning. Unfortunately a slight misunderstanding arose between them. One night they openly quarreled when heated by wine, and exchanged blows. The following evening your father chancing to be officer of the guard and on duty, my father, whose wife had then been dead a year, was thoughtless enough to accompany Mrs. Nolan home at a late hour from a post ball. It was merely an act of ordinary courtesy; but gossips magnified the tale, and bore it to Nolan. Still smarting from the former quarrel, in which I fear my father was in the wrong, he left the guard house with the openly avowed intention of seeking immediate satisfaction. In the meanwhile Slavin, Murphy, and a trooper named Flynn, who had been to town without passes, and were half-drunk, stole through the guard lines and decided to make a midnight raid on the colonel's private office. Dodging along behind the powder house, they ran suddenly upon my father, then on the way to his own quarters. Whether they were recognized by him, or whether drink made them reckless or consequences, is unknown, but one of the men instantly fired. Then they ran, and succeeded in gaining the barracks unsuspected."

She sat as if fascinated by his recital.

"Your father heard the shot, and sprang toward the sound, only to fall headlong across my father's lifeless body. As he came heavily down, his revolver was jarred out of its holster and dropped unnoticed in the grass. An instant later the guard came running up, and by morning Capt. Nolan was under arrest charged with murder. The circumstantial evidence was strong—his quarrel with the murdered man, his heated language a few moments previous, the revolver lying beside the body, having two chambers discharged, and his being found there alone with the man he had gone forth to seek. Slavin and Flynn both strengthened the case by positive testimony. As a result, a court-martial dismissed the prisoner in disgrace from the army, and a civil court sentenced him to ten years' imprisonment."

"And my mother?" The question was a trembling whisper from quivering lips.

"Your mother," he said regretfully, "was an exceedingly proud woman, belonging to a family of social prominence in the east. She felt deeply the causeless gossip connecting her name with the case, as well as the open disgrace of her husband's conviction. She refused to receive her former friends, and even failed in loyalty to your father in his time of trial. It is impossible now to fix the fault clearly, or to account for her actions. Capt. Nolan turned over all his property to her, and the moment she could do so she disappeared from the fort, taking you with her. From that hour none of her old acquaintances could learn anything regarding her whereabouts. She did not return to her family in the east, nor correspond with anyone in the army. Probably, utterly broken-hearted, she sought seclusion in some city. How Gillis obtained possession of you remains a mystery."

"Is that all?"

"Everything."

They kept silent for a long time, the slow tears dropping from her eyes, her hands clasped in her lap. His heart, heavy with sympathy, would not permit him to break in upon her deep sorrow with words of comfort.

"Naida," he whispered at last, "this may not be the time for me to speak such words, but you are all alone now. Will you go back to Bethune with me—back to the old regiment as my wife?"

A moment she bowed her head before him; then lifted it and held out her hands. "I will."

"Say to me again what you once said."

"Donald, I love you."

Gently he drew her down to him, and their lips met.

"I wish you to be very happy, Naida, dear," he whispered, drawing her head tenderly down until it found rest upon his shoulder.

"Yes, I feel you do, and I am; but it cannot come all at once, Donald, for I have lost so much—so much. I—I hope he knows."

(The End.)

What Caused the Hard Times.

The Lewiston Sun solemnly declares that it was not the tariff but currency that "caused the hard times of 1893." The year 1893 was a period of apprehension and consequent depression among business men who were not disposed to take chances in the face of the declared intentions of a new Democratic administration controlling both branches of congress, and outspoken in its hostility to the long established policy of protection. Panic conditions, however, and universal hard times did not come until the latter part of 1894, following the passage of the infamous free trade Wilson bill, which closed our mills and factories all over the land by putting them into competition with the mills of Europe operated by cheap labor. These hard times continued, getting worse and worse until after the passage of the Dingley law, since when the country has enjoyed an era of uninterrupted and unexampled prosperity.—August Journal.

When Stringent Times Come Again.

"The statistics of manufacturing in Canada indicate that the Fielding tariff is admirably suited to the wants of this country."—The Globe.

The Fielding tariff, like the fly on the wheel, has nothing whatever to do with the success of manufacturing in Canada. What about the general prosperity of the whole world? When stringent times come again, as come they will, the Fielding tariff will have to be revised upward or the manufacturing industries of the country will suffer severely.—Canadian Manufacturer.

The End of Her Waiting

By Emma Howard Wight

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

I was a girl of 15 when we first came to live in Barclay street. Mother had just died, and our little cottage home, down in the country, had become intolerable to father, so he decided we should go to the city, where a clerkship had been offered him. It nearly broke my heart to leave the pretty cottage for a lodging house in a dull, narrow street; but I tried to be brave before father and cheerful.

Sitting at the parlor window a great deal, I soon became very much interested in my opposite neighbor. Her little gray two-story house was the prettiest in Barclay street, with its white blinds and flower-filled windows, and a middle-aged servant woman was her only companion. She was known in Barclay street as "Miss Molly," and loved and reverenced for her goodness and charity among the poor and suffering.

After a little while we become acquainted, and a new life began for me. We met one morning, as I was on my way to the provision store, and she was starting on some errand of mercy. She smiled, and made some remark about the beauty of the day, and we walked down the street together. Before we parted, she invited me to come and take tea with her the following afternoon. I went, only too glad, and those were the happiest hours I had spent for a long time. After we had had tea in the cozy little dining-room, I sat down on a low stool at her feet, and told her all about mother; and I loved her from the moment she laid her hand upon my head, and murmured so softly and so pityingly: "Poor child."

After that evening I spent a great deal of my time with Miss Molly, and my life was no longer dull and lonely. I soon grew to love her very dearly, and she returned my affection. After a little while I began to suspect that some past sorrow cast its shadow over her life; but I had known her nearly two years before my suspicions were confirmed. It was a lovely morning, the first day of June, and I had bought a lovely bunch of roses for Miss Molly when I went to do my marketing. When I went over I found the front door ajar, so I went in and ran up to the little room where Miss Molly usually sat the first part of the morning. She was seated in a low rocking-chair her head lying back heavily, her little white hands resting idly on her lap. As she turned her face towards me I saw it was white and stained from long and bitter weeping. The next moment I was kneeling at her feet, my arms about her, imploring her to tell me if she were ill or what was wrong. She looked down into my face for a few moments; then she said quietly: "To-day, dear, is the anniversary of a great suffering in my life, and for many long years I have spent it in bitter weeping; child," she went on, putting her hand under my chin and raising my face that she might see better into my eyes, "your eyes are so true, so full of affection and sympathy and pity for me that a desire comes over me to tell you the story of my life, and the sorrow which darkened it. I have kept it locked up in my heart so long that it will be a relief to unburden it. Come and sit, as you always do, at my feet." I obeyed in silence, and waited for her to begin, which after a few moments she did.

A Moment Later the Door Was Thrown Open.

"My parents were well-to-do people of the middle-class, and I was their only child for ten years, and then my little brother was born. My parents were very fond of the child as he grew from babyhood, for he was remarkably beautiful; but their affection was nothing like the love I bore him. People used to wonder at it, even my parents were puzzled at it. When I was 17 years of age, and Robert, my little brother, seven, our parents died within the same year. My father's income had been derived from a salary, which of course ceased at his death; but just about that time a small fortune was left me by an aunt, including this house. Here we came to live, Robbie and I, and a middle-aged servant woman, Margaret, the mother of the woman who is with me now. My whole life was then devoted to my idolized brother, to the exclusion of all else. I could have had lovers, I could have married; but no one could come before Robert in my heart. He did not lose his beauty as he grew older; he was bright, lovable, affectionate; but, alas, weak, easily influenced, and possessed a quick, fiery temper which he never tried to control or restrain.

"I will not linger over the years that passed until Robert reached his twenty-first year. It was his desire to study law, so he entered the office of a prominent lawyer in this city. He had only been there a few months, when through a young man in the office, he was introduced into a fast set, and in a short time was plunged into dissipation. When I realized this, I was nearly crazed with fear and pain. I implored, remonstrated, wept. He would be sorrowfully repentant for awhile; then go back again. This state of things went on for six months; then came the end. Involved in money difficulties, debts of honor, gambling debts, driven beside himself, reckless, desperate, this poor, misguided boy robbed his employer, took a large sum of money from the safe, to which he had always had access. This was soon discovered by the man he had robbed, who taxed him with it, privately, but sternly, and threateningly, and my poor boy, madly letting his quick temper get the best of him, answered insolently. High words followed. Robert solemnly asserted that the lawyer struck him first; however, Robert picked up a heavy chair and felled him to the ground with it. And in a week's time he died from the effects of the blow." Her voice faltered, she paused; I could only press her hands in silent sympathy. "You can guess, dear, what followed." He was arrested, tried, and condemned to 15 years' imprisonment, which in this state means solitary confinement. Oh, child, child, shall I ever forget that morning—it was the first day of June—when he stood in the prisoner's dock, so young, so rarely handsome, and listened with a white, set face and quivering lips to that sentence? I nearly went mad then. I fell on my knees with wild sobs and moans; then I fainted, and when I had recovered they had taken him away.

"I saw him once again to bid him farewell. I was calm then with the calmness of woe too deep for utterance. He also was silent, numbed with a terrible, sullen despair. 'Dear,' I said to him, pillowing his head on my breast as I had so often done, 'the years must pass. I will pray and wait for you in our little home, and, should Heaven spare us both, some day you will come to me, there to begin a new life together.' And, dear, I have been waiting 13 long years; I have counted each day, each week, each month of them as they glided by, and now, but two more years remain, and my waiting will be over." She paused, her cheeks grew softly flushed, her eyes sparkled with an intense and rapturous joy. "Two years," she repeated, "only two years of waiting."

Only two more years; but one had hardly past when Miss Molly's cheeks grew paler and thinner, her step slow and languid. This was the beginning, and from that time her health began steadily to decline, and, with bitter pain, I realized she was slowly fading out of life.

One evening, as I knelt beside her easy chair, where she now sat all day, she laid her thin hand gently on my head and said: "Dear, you know that I am going to leave you before long?" I hid my face in her lap, and burst into tears. "You must not grieve too much, my child," she went on, "it is God's will; I shall not be here to make his life happy and bright; but I shall live to see him once more, my boy, my Robert.

The weeks and months glided by; daily she grew weaker, frailer grew her hold on life. The year was nearly up; but I never thought she would live to see it; but she did. The first day of June came, such a sunny, beautiful day. I had been with her all night, and when the first rays of the sun shone into her room, a radiant smile lighted up her sweet white face, and I heard her whisper: "The years of waiting are over." She hardly spoke the rest of the day, but lay with a listening look on her face, and the faint smile lingering about her lips. My heart was nearly bursting with sorrow and suspense. She could not live through the night, I knew. Ah! would he come, or would she have waited so long in vain? The day wore on; I was sitting beside her holding her hand, when I heard the front door open, and a man's step in the hall and upon the stair. I thought it was the doctor returning, when a low cry from Miss Molly caused me to turn. With a superhuman effort she had raised herself in bed, and her great blue eyes were fixed with a look I shall never forget upon the door.

"Hush," she whispered, " he is coming." A moment later the door was thrown open, and a man stood upon the threshold. A man prematurely aged, with bent shoulders, gray, close-cropped head, and a worn, haggard face, bearing the remains of great beauty. His eyes saw nothing, save the figure on the bed; then he bounded across the room, and caught her in his arms. "Molly, sister," I heard him murmur. Her head sank against his breast with a sigh of utter peace and content. "My boy, my boy," she murmured, "the waiting is over." She smiled once, and then died. I saw the worn, handsome face of the man grow as white as the smiling one on his breast. "My God," he cried aloud, "dead, gone." Then, as his heavy sobs echoed through the room, I stole away, the tears falling over my cheeks; leaving them alone—the dead, who had waited so long—the living, who had come too late.

THE REPUBLICAN

THURSDAY. DEC. 26. 1907.

SOMEWHAT BY WAY OF ANALOGY.

Two great future events stand out in New-Testament prophecy incidental to the Divine Incarnation and Human Resurrection—a new heaven and a new earth, and a race ransomed from the fall.

We are not prepared to detail the mineralogical and crystalizing processes by which Nature is to achieve its renaissance, but there is assurance of revolution embryonic in the heart of the earth, seen in ebullitions of gaseous forces, and visible elemental distractions on solar and planetary surfaces tell of sympathetic unrest on high.

Indeed, the fires, already lit, are smoldering, patiently, it is true, but smoldering, and just as the primeval floods held the new-born earth in the water and out of the water, emerging at the climacteric moment into finished systems of mountain, hill, vale, plain, stream, lake, sea and ocean, so will the renewed globe come forth from a fire attempered to purify, not to destroy.

For we can believe that the same Almighty hand which gathered together the waters in one place will quench the smokeless flame just at the acme of completion—just at the pitch of perfect polish of a new heaven and a new earth, flecked by no speck of evil, by nothing that defileth, or that maketh a lie.

To such a home the Second Man and His race shall return—a home where none shall hunger, neither thirst any more—to the earth, awhile outcast from Redemption; and in the noontide of that nightless day—in the home sense of a recovered world, they will take their place forever.

It is to such a destiny the Christian religion, hospitably interpreted, invites all.

It is to the substance of things not hitherto seen, of which all earthly good is but a hint.

It is to a joy, of which all joy here is a mockery.

It is to a rest, of which all rest below is but a glimmer.

It is to a day for which all other days were made.

It is to a liberty, besides which all earthly freedom is bondage.

It is to a franchise, before which all terrestrial license shrinks into dungeon privilege.

It is to a home from which there is no child far away.

It is to a state wherein property will cease, but possession fail not.

It is to a community of matured Christianship endowed and animated by a perfect assurance of achieved immortality—an endless instituition, imperishable as the instinct of liberty in the heart of a bird.

When will come this future epiphany? How long hence.

It matters not. A thousand years are as one day in the realm of universal motion, and all things take their measured, regulated turn. The earthquake signalizes the advent of a new era in some under-world domain, and the comet's gleaming train is but the flourish of an Almighty pen which signatures the close of a firmamental epoch.

Whosoever among us, therefore, who honor Christmas in all the name implies—exemplifying the peace and good-will embodied in charity to the poor and the Golden Rule to all—these already feel the glow of the better, brighter life. For they who treat the poor as if the millenium were here, already have a foretaste of the millenium which is to come.

THE CHRISTMAS MESSAGE.

The Christmas message to the world, above all others the sweetest, and among all the most important and most practical, is the message of peace; not only of that peace between man and his God, of which the theologian speaks, but peace between man and man, peace among the nations.

He, whose birthday is celebrated at Christmas, is preeminently Prince of Peace, and it is a wondrously significant fact of history that the angels' song of "Peace on earth" perfectly described the condition of the world at the time of his coming. Then over all the earth was peace. The gates of the temple of Janus, at Rome, were closed, there being as the Empire supposed no need of the presence of their god to lead their conquering armies in victorious battle.

"No roar of battle sourd
Was heard the world around,
The idle spear and shield were high uphung,
The hooked chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood,
The trumpet spoke not to the armed throng,
And kings sat still, with aweful eye,
As if they surely knew
Their sovran Lord was by;
And peaceful was the night
Wherein the Prince of Light
His reign of peace upon the earth began.

As then, so at this Christmastide, there is peace among the nations. Nowhere in all the earth are nations as nations engaged in warfare. In the year 1900, Minister Wu, of China, made an address in New York, on Confucianism, in which he declared that the principles of peace enunciated by the Founder of the Christian religion are visionary and impossible of attainment. Those, to whom that old, old Christmas story is not a myth, but the grandest event in the world's history, do not believe that these principles are "impossible of attainment." Once war and conquest was the highest ambition of the nations. Now, wherever men have heard the Christmas message, war is no longer the ruling passion. Where men have felt the power of the Prince of Peace, there is no longer war for war's sake. Today, a state of war is the exception and not the rule. Men think of armies and the horrors of war with dread. Louder and louder grows the demand for peaceful arbitration of of all disputes. Even the Central American Republics will celebrate this Christmas the agreement for the establishment of a tribunal for the settlement of differences, that heretofore could be determined only by the arbitrament of war.

Another sign of the age is seen in this fact, that once the whole record of all nations in days of old was made up of poges of deeds of blood. Then the victor had no mercy for the vanquished.

It was always war to the death. Now, on the field of battle, every wounded enemy becomes a brother, whose wounds, made by the hand of war, are to be healed with the hand of love, while over every battle camp floats the flag of the Red Cross, the banner of mercy, and on every firing line, gentle women and skilled surgeons, angels of mercy, minister alike to friend and foeman.

Not alone the promise but the ever increasing fulfillment brings the assurance that:

"Lo the days are hastening on
By prophet bards foretold,
When with the ever circling years
Comes back the age of gold,
When peace shall over all the earth
Its blessed banner fling,
And the whole world sent back the song,
Which now the angels sing."

SHORT RUN.

The farmers are making good use of the present snow, getting in their winter coal, etc.

Prof. Chas. Moore is holding a term of singing school at this place now and is having good attendance and the best behavior. He is thought a great deal of by the Short Run people, especially the girls.

Misses Verba and Pearl Walker were the guests of Miss Merle Fowler Sunday.

Mrs. Alta Junkins has been on the sick list the past two weeks, but by the skillful treatment of Dr. J. W. Harvey am glad to say she is recovering.

Mrs. J. T. Harvey recently returned from Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Moon and Miss Lucy Junkins were the guests of Daniel Wilson Sunday.

Mr. Milo Wilson is operating his coal mine for this neighborhood and it is likely to prove satisfactory.

The Short Run Grange is on the boom.

Mr. Russell Walters, of Deer Park, spent a few days with his aunt, Mrs. E. E. Harvey, last week.

Miss Esta Wilson was visiting Miss Ruth Wilson yesterday.

Several of our Short Run damsels expect to spend a few days at Keyser soon.

Mr. Geo. W. Moon, living on the Eagle Rock road between Deer Park and Blaine, has been annoyed lately by the traveling public. The other night a gang of "tramps" gave him a call about 11 o'clock and begged for the night's lodging. Uncle George's heart was hard. He would not yield to persuasion. The "tramps" thought the bitter had over come the sweet before they got home.

Mr. Jas. H. Wilson has had a little mishap crossing a barb-wire fence, but was not seriously injured.

Milo and Tom are still running a race but cannot yet tell which will win. If they don't watch I fear Scott, Muggins, Mar, Snap or Arthur might win the game yet, for if we judge right they are about as deep in the mud as Milo and Tom are in the mire.

We are glad to say our school is progressing nicely under the management of Miss Merle Fouler.

I close wishing THE REPUBLICAN every success.

Christ, the Lord, is Born.

Graphic Description of the Birth of Christ, by General Lew Wallace, in His Famous Production, "Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ"

Prophecy:

For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon His shoulder: and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.—Isa. 9:6.

The night, like most nights of the winter season in the hill country, was clear, crisp, and sparkling with stars. There was no wind. The atmosphere seemed never so pure, and the stillness was more than silence; it was a holy hush, a warning that heaven was stooping low to whisper some good thing to the listening earth.

By the gate, hugging his mantle close, the watchman walked; at times he stopped, attracted by a stir among the sleeping herds, or by a jackal's cry off on the mountain-side. The midnight was slow coming to him; but at last it came. His task was done; now for the dreamless sleep with which labor blesses its wearied children! He moved towards the fire, but paused; a light was breaking around him, soft and white, like the moon's. He waited breathlessly. The light deepened; things before invisible came to view; he saw the whole field, and all it sheltered. A chill sharper than that of the frosty air—a chill of fear—smote him. He looked up; the stars were gone; the light was dropping as from a window in the sky; it became a splendor, then, in terror, he cried,

"Awake, awake!"

Up sprang the dogs, and, howling, ran away.

The herds rushed together bewildered.

The men clambered to their feet, weapons in hand.

"What is it?" they asked, in one voice.

"See!" cried the watchman, "the sky is on fire!"

Suddenly the light became intolerably bright, and they covered their eyes, and dropped upon their knees; then, as their soul shrank with fear, they fell upon their faces blind and fainting, and would have died had not a voice said to them,

"Fear not!"

And they listened.

"Fear not; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."

The voice, in sweetness and soothing more than human, and low and clear, penetrated all their being, and filled them with assurance. They arose upon their knees, and, looking worshipfully, beheld in the centre of a great glory the appearance of a man, clad in a robe intensely white; above its shoulders towered the tops of wings shining and folded; a star over its forehead glowed with a steady lustre, brilliant as Hesperus, its hands were stretched towards them in blessing; its face was serene and divinely beautiful.

They had often heard, and, in their simple way talked of angels; and they doubted not now, but said, in their hearts, The glory of God is about us, and this is he who of old came to the prophet by the river of Ulai.

Directly the angel continued:

"For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord!"

Again there was a rest, while the words sank into their minds.

"And this shall be a sign unto you," the annunciator said next. "Ye shall find the babe, wrapped in swaddling-clothes, lying in a manger."

The herald spoke not again; his good tidings were told; yet he stayed awhile. Suddenly the light, of which he seemed the centre, turned roseate and began to tremble; then up, far as the men could see, there was flashing of white wings, and coming and going of radiant forms, and voices as of a multitude chanting in unison.

"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men!"

Not once the praise, but many times.

Then the herald raised his eyes as seeking approval of one for off; his wings stirred, and spread slowly and majestically, on their upper side white as snow, in the shadow vari-tinted, like mother-of-pearl; when they had expanded many cubits beyond his stature, he arose lightly, and, without effort, floated out of view, taking the light up with him. Long after he was gone, down from the sky fell the refrain in measure mellowed by distance, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will towards men."

When the shepherds came fully to their senses, they stared at each other stupidly, until one of them said, "It was Gabriel, the Lord's messenger unto men."

None answered.

"Christ the Lord is born: said he not so?"

Then another recovered his voice, and replied, "That is what he said."

"And did he not also say, in the city of David, which is our Bethlehem yonder. And that we should find him a babe in swaddling-clothes?"

"And lying in a manager."

The first speaker gazed into the fire thoughtfully, but at length said, like one possessed of a sudden resolve, "There is but one place in Bethlehem where there are mangers; but one, and that is in the cave near the old khan. Brethren, let us go see this thing which has come to pass. The priests and doctors have been a long time looking for the Christ. Now he is born, and the Lord has given us a sign by which to know him. Let us go up and worship him."

"But the flocks!"

"The Lord will take care of them. Let us make haste."

Then they all arose and left the marah.

Our merchants have all enjoyed a fine trade the past two weeks, some of them having been so rushed as to be obliged to keep extra clerks to supply their customers. Few towns in the state can compare with this in the amount of business transacted at this or any other season of the year. It has become an established fact that goods can be bought as cheap here as anywhere, and in many instances much cheaper. Hence, the immense crowds that gather here every week.

The Boxer Boxed

HER name was Mary Boutwell. She came from old Puritan stock on her father's side and from a colonial Virginian family on her mother's. She had the tall and forceful figure of her New England forbears added to the tender grace of the southern woman, and with these she had the beauty of sweet brown eyes, waving brown hair and such a color and complection that they might be called fairy gifts; also she had visions of a career.

She was not left an orphan. An anxious line of admirers filed through the wide gates of the old plantation home and walked up between the box hedges to the wide veranda, where Mary generally sat with her maiden aunt, the latter making wonderful devices in tatting, and Mary, with her easel before her, perfunctorily making sketches which she rarely finished, but which her aunt religiously preserved.

The Boutwell plantation had been a large one before the war, but under the inefficient care of the aunt had dwindled steadily. Miss Boutwell had unlimited power as guardian to buy, sell, mortgage and borrow and lend. The first warning of the final calamity came along late in the fall and was in the shape of a threatened foreclosure of the mortgage on the last of the once vast possessions, the big and almost empty house. Mary had spent money lavishly in college and gave and lent as her generous aunt had done in ignorance of the real state of things. On the 1st of January this money must be paid. The aunt had been notified, but let the matter drag, as she felt that something would turn up to save their home. Mary was trying to understand the situation, but in vain.

And the young men came a-wooing.

They were all made welcome by the romantic aunt and all invited to dinner or supper, with the old open handed liberality, but Mary showed no favor to any one. But that is not saying that she did not think often of Bert Allen. She could appreciate his character. She had just come from college, where much stress was laid upon mental attainment, and she wondered how it was that a young man only a clerk in a lawyer's office could have learned so much. She knew that he had lived all his life here, that his parents had died poor after the devastating war, that he had had a bitter struggle, but she could not understand how he had learned so much that the other young men were totally ignorant of—art, for instance, art from its first inception to the present day, in all its branches and ramifications.

What she did not take into account was that Bert had known her from infancy and that for her sake and to be able to properly appreciate her career he gave every moment he could spare to the study of all that books could teach him and that when he had business north he fairly haunted the art galleries and picture stores and studios. His heart sank as the conviction was forced upon him that it would be many years before Mary could hope for success, if ever, for somehow he came to see that, while she had undeniable talent, she was not a genius, and he knew that she had not the power of steady and continuous work, which sometimes almost equals real genius. And he felt, too, that he could plan a career for Mary that would be far more satisfying to her than the painting of mediocre pictures, but he dared not give voice to his thought.

The autumn passed, while Bert tried in every way his fertile mind could invent to find some way to further his own cause with Mary and to save her home. The [illegible] Christmas had come before he had dreamed than [illegible] over the impossibility of it all.

Mary had determined to have a Christmas such as she had seen in the [illegible] and at the homes of her schoolmates—a big tree and presents for all. [illegible] rode out every day as soon as [illegible] were done to help Mary in the decoration of her tree, and they all anticipated much pleasure. After the children had gone home with their presents the young folks were to have games and a supper and a good old fashioned Virginia reel.

MARY READ THE LETTER.

Christmas fell on Saturday this year. Bert had expected to be there every evening during the week to help, but Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday passed without a word from him, nor did he come.

At first Mary was surprised, then hurt, then indignant. He should have sent her word at least if he had not intended to come, and she went about with a heightened color but with a heavier heart than the occasion warranted or she realized. The skies were dark and the house gloomy, and she was growing very tired of the whole thing since Bert had not come to help. He was so capable and so cheery! Well, she had lived twenty years without him and doubtless would not die if he did not come at all.

The reason of Bert's apparent defection was that Mr. Burnside, his employer, was dangerously ill. He was alone in the world, having no relative living, and it became Bert's duty to remain with him and take care of him, for Mr. Burnside could not bear Bert to leave him. Bert had written to Mary, and, with the strange generosity which strikes any man when it regards the woman he loves, Bert gave an old negro a dollar to take the letter. The dollar and a saloon proved too much for the old man, and the next morning he was carried to the calaboose, while the letter lay a soaked scrap of paper in the mud.

Mary loved dogs. Bert knew this and had intended to give her a superb St. Bernard dog as her Christmas gift. This noble creature was in a small neighboring place to which there was no railroad, and Bert had had his friend make a large box in which to bring him to Mary's home. The box was large and really quite handsome and was provided with air holes. The splendid dog would be taken in it to the plantation and set on the veranda in daylight, or, at least, that was Bert's plan. A letter was written and inclosed in a strong envelope, which was also to contain the key to the padlock, and in Bert's pockets were tacks and a hammer to fasten it on the top of the box.

Friday afternoon Mr. Burnside passed away in the arms of his young clerk. The old man had sincerely loved Bert, and Bert loved him, though still somewhat in awe of him. Bert was truly grieved, but "men must work," so Bert hastily gave the necessary orders for the funeral Sunday, and then he rushed to his friend to see about shipping the dog so that it should reach Mary's home at the precise time.

When Bert reached the little town he went to the express office and by unusual offers managed to persuade them that the dog be delivered as he wished.

TAKE ME INSTEAD OF HIM.

though they would have to ride nearly all night. But there was a moon. They were to follow as soon as they could hitch up.

But when Bert reached his friend he found him in bed, so he would have to get the dog ready for shipment himself. He went to the stable and found the box. It was large and roomy and had soft hay on the bottom. But Prince Roland was as big as a man, and Bert began to wonder if this box would be large enough for so monstrous a dog to turn in. He tacked the letter containing the key to the self locking padlock on the top, and then he thought he would get in himself and see if it was large enough. He found it quite roomy enough, and the warmth was agreeable. He lay down and curled around in a comfortable position while wondering what Mary would say to the dog and fell sound asleep. He was worn out with three nights of watching, and he slept so soundly that he knew nothing of what took place after.

What did happen was this: The men came for the dog, found the big box with the padlock on, snapped that shut as they saw what in the semidarkness they thought was the dog and loaded it in the wagon. The weight and subdued snoring made them feel sure the big animal was asleep inside.

Mary and her household were all astir, as this was Christmas morning, and there was much to do. Through the dim light of the early dawn they saw two men tugging an immense box to lift it carefully out.

Mary sent two other men to help, and the strange looking box was brought to the veranda. She wondered what it could be.

The expressman took his receipt book to Mary, who mechanically signed it while she looked at the awkward box askance.

"I reckon it's a dawg," said one of the men. The other then pried off the tacks that held the letter and handed it to Mary, saying:

"If you'll take out that there key we'll take him out."

The men both had a faint fear that the dog was dead, as he had made no sound, though coming over the rough road they had traveled and with their ears bundled as they were they could not have heard it had he barked. Mary gave them the key and read the letter. It was:

Dear Miss Mary—I beg you to accept the one you will find in this box as your Christmas gift. He will love and protect you and be devoted to you alone as long as he lives, asking but a little of your priceless love in return. Wishing you a merry Christmas. BERT ALLEN.

Somehow her heart grew lighter, her cheeks grew red and her eyes sparkled. So he had not forgotten her.

"We will take him out for you," said one of the men again.

"Go and get a big piece of meat and a basin of water, Billy, and then we will open the box. He will be strange at first," said Mary, while her aunt looked afraid.

"Oh, I know the dawg. He's a fine animal," said the first expressman. "He's as gentle as a kitten, and he's young, but as big as a man."

By this time the water and meat had come, and the expressmen opened the box, but to their surprise they found a man in it. He made no reply to their questions. They finally got him out, and then he proved to be Bert Allen, limp, pale and scarcely able to stand.

He tried to collect his senses and understand how he came to be here on Mary's veranda. At last he saw and recognized the letter in Mary's hand and stammered:

"Miss Mary, I don't know how it has happened that I am here in the place of Prince Roland, but if you read the letter over and take me instead of him for your Christmas gift"—

"It is too cold out here. Mary, bring him into the sitting room by the fire, and I'll tell Dinah to hurry the breakfast. And you, men, come out and have some hot coffee." This from the aunt, who was quick enough to see that the best thing to do was to give the young people a chance to talk it over.

The upshot of it all was that Bert stayed and helped with the tree and also that there was a wedding in May, when Mary deliberately abandoned her career and settled down for life as a happy wife and mother. Bert inherited a comfortable fortune from Mr. Burnside, and so with "neither poverty nor great riches" they were very happy. Mary keeps in the garret the big box where once the boxer was boxed.

A Christmas Story

If the reader wants to settle in a wide-awake community, all he has to do is to look at the local newspapers. A wide-awake, well-supported home newspaper is always associated with good schools, churches, active business, and intelligent people. It never fails. No business man or pioneer in any community makes any better investment than in the support of a home newspaper.

Monday's rain and prevailing warm weather of that evening and night, spoiled the excellent sledding the people of Garrett county had been enjoying for more than a week previous. Besides putting an end to the sleighing the merchants of Oakland felt the consequent slump in business as many of the people from rural districts who had intended making their Christmas purchases Monday and Tuesday stayed at home.

One of our exchanges tells of an old German who had a boy of whom he was very proud, and decided to find out the trend of his mind. He adopted a novel method by which to test him. He slipped into the boy's room one morning and placed on his table a bottle of whiskey, a Bible and a silver dollar. "Now," said he, "when dot boy comes in if he takes dot dollar he's going to be a beeznis man; if he takes dot Bible he's going to be a preacher; if he takes dot whiskey he's no good, and going to be a drunkard." Then he hid behind a door to see which his son would choose. In come the boy whistling. He ran up to the table picked up the Bible and put it under his arm, then snatched up the bottle, took two or three drinks, picked up the dollar and went out smacking his lips. The Dutchmon poked his head out from behind the door and exclaimed: "Mein Got, he is going to be a bolitician."

Among the many students who have returned to their home in and near Oakland for the holidays, are Messrs. Harry McComas, from Mercersburg, Pa., who is accompanied by a school mate; William W. Grant, Edward E. Sollars and Frank Weber, from Maryland University; Milton and Edward Sincell and Edmund Manges, from Gettysburg College; Ralph Thayer, from West Virginia University; Philip Peddicord, from Western Maryland College; Roy Hammond, from Strathmore College.

Memorable is the institution of Christmas. It is a festival of the Christian church observed on December 25 as the anniversary of the Savior's birth established by Pope Telesphorus, who died A. D. 138, and throughout the subsequent history of the church the day has been one of the most noted of Christian solemnities. In olden times, confounded with the Epiphany, it was celebrated in the month of April and May. In the fourth century, however, St. Cyril of Jerusalem succeeded in obtaining from Pope Julian I an order for ascertaining the exact day of Christ's nativity. The great theologians of the time took as a basis the tables of the censors in the archives of Rome, and established the day which has prevailed ever since.

What the New Year Brought Him

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1905, by Frank H. Sweet.

BRAYTON, owner, stepped from the dingy little room at the end of the long black building, dubbed office, and walked briskly to the door of the foundry division. He had come down from the city that morning and was going back by the afternoon train. He took out his watch.

"Longmore," he called. "Mr. Longmore!"

A strongly built young man emerged from the grimy interior. Brayton looked at him speculatively.

"You will have this lot out by 4 o'clock, Longmore, I think you said?" he interrogated.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, you may draw the fires then and have the men begin clearing up. I shall not be down again."

In spite of its mask of iron black, Longmore's face expressed incredulous surprise.

"You don't mean close the furnace, sir?"

"I mean just that," calmly. "I have been experimenting two years and losing money right along. The ore is too poor in quality for profitable working. I shall be sorry to lose your services, but all my other furnaces are fully supplied with managers and foremen. Of course," thoughtfully, "if you should care to commence again as an ordinary workman, we might"—

"I do not wish to leave here," broke in Longmore impetuously, "and, if you'll excuse me, I think you are making a big mistake in closing the furnace. It will pay well in time. My experiments"—

"Yes, things have improved since you took charge," interrupted Brayton, "but you have not been able to eliminate the loss." He took a letter from his pocket, which he unfolded and passed to Longmore. It read:

T. H. Brayton:

Dear Sir—We shall have to make a heavy reduction in price allowed for your Brand Furnace output. Though better than previous shipment, it is still very poor and much inferior to what we are getting elsewhere, or even from your other furnaces. Thus far we have been able to use it in limited quantities in certain kinds of work, but new processes are being introduced into many furnaces which improve the quality of the output, and of course we must use the best procurable in order to meet competition. We are sorry, but as friends we would advise the closing of Brand's furnace.

"Your agents are mistaken about the quality of our ore," Longmore said firmly as he passed the letter back. "We have a published record here of the output of other furnaces, and twelve—yes, six—months ago the average quality was no better than Brand's. You must remember that I have had charge only three months and that I had all the real practical work to demonstrate from my theoretical knowledge. In six months we can have Brand's furnace yielding as good quality as the average. If you will let me have six months—or even three—I feel sure that I can prove to you that I am right."

Brayton shook his head. "I can understand your enthusiasm, Longmore," he answered. "I was that way at your age, but iron is a plain, hard, practical business, and this is your first command, so to speak." He looked at his watch once more. "Twenty minutes to train time. Suppose we walk back to the office and wait until we hear the whistle. Of course I shall try to sell, but frankly I do not expect to find either customers or lessees. I would be glad to lease for a nominal sum, though, just to have somebody here; but, of course, no one would care to operate the furnace at a loss."

"If I could"—began Longmore. Then he stopped abruptly. He was going to say if he could raise the money, but he could not, so what was the use of thinking about it? He added instead, "If I could have charge here, there would be a profit inside of three months."

Brayton's eyes twinkled, and an odd look came into them.

"You'd like to take the plant yourself if you had the money," he said abruptly. "How much would you require to carry the furnace on to what you believe would be expense making? If I lent you $10,000, would it be sufficient?"

Longmore was on his feet, his eyes wide and looking grotesque in their rims of iron black.

"You don't mean this, Mr. Brayton," he gasped. "I have no means, no security, not even my college expenses paid yet. Then there's"—

"I've seen your work," coolly, "and am ready to lend you the money until the 1st of January. Unless you bring the output to a profit by that time, however, I will try to sell. Do you want it?"

"Of course, if you're willing, though"—

"There's the train whistle," interrupted Brayton, rising from his chair and starting toward the door. "You may draw on me for the money as you need it up to $10,000, no more. And—er," as the train curved in sight around a hill and slowed toward the platform, "remember our compact. There's to be no correspondence whatever between you and Helen until you are fully able to support a wife."

Longmore watched him board the train with conflicting emotions, then went back to the office.

First he wrote to Mr. Brayton, offering him one-half of the profits after he had brought the furnace to a paying basis, in the meantime incurring all expenses of running work and improvements himself. That done, he called the men and made them acquainted with the change.

"Mr. Brayton had arranged for you to leave Saturday night," he said, "and to stop work altogether. However, I am going to run the furnace myself awhile experimentally, but will close the foundry. I shall require only fifty men, and they must be willing to work hard and accept long hours. We will begin at daylight instead of at 7, as we have been doing, and will have one hour for the noon meal and rest and then work until dark, but I will pay you $3 instead of the $2 you have been receiving. It will be hard work, of course, but I will ask no one to work any harder than I do myself, and I will add that I do not want any except trustworthy men who will do as well by me when I am absent as when I am with them. Those who feel they can meet these conditions and are willing to work for me may step forward."

Several of the more energetic men were talking among themselves. Longmore's eyes swept over them and over the rest of the group, singling out a face here and there that he thought looked promising. Presently he went among them, with a few earnest, persuasive words here and there, and in the end he hired fifty men who promised to work as he desired.

Monday morning he and two of the men descended into the furnace to make some changes. When they came out Longmore went to the mine to see how the work of getting out ore was progressing.

As he approached the mouth of the mine he listened for the sounds of work, but could only hear the regular strokes of a single pick. Then as he turned a spur he saw the reason. Three of the men were lying on the ground in front of the opening, apparently asleep; two were tossing pebbles at each other, and the rest were lying about in various attitudes of ease.

"Got the furnace job done?" asked a stalwart young fellow as he rose, yawning.

"Yes. Why are you not at work?"

"Got tired an' thought we'd rest a spell. 'Sides, one of the men 'lowed there wa'n't much show for our gettin' paid an' that ye had only what ye'd earned as boss. I s'pose it's all right, though," lazily, "an' if ye say 'tis we'll start in ag'in after we lie a spell."

"Yes," quietly, "the money part is all right. Who is that working in the mine?"

"Billy Brooks," contemptuously. "That man 'll wear out an' drop down dead 'fore he knows, an' nobody 'll be to blame 'cept himself an' meibbe the man who drives him on to such work. The fellow's a crank an' don't know any more'n to do jest what he's told, an'"—

But Longmore had passed on.

Ten minutes later he came back. The men were stretching themselves preparatory to resuming work.

"Now you can come to the office and get your pay," he said briskly. "There will be less than half a day coming to you, for Brooks says you rested two hours or more this forenoon and that you have been here about two hours now. I shall pay you for just the time you work."

"Oh, we don't want any pay yet if it's all right," answered the young man sullenly. "But it's been three-quarters of a day. Folks have to rest, an' if Billy Brooks don't look out he'll"—

"Stop right there," requested Longmore, with a sudden ring in his voice. "Mr. Brooks will be your foreman after this, in my absence, and will keep an exact account of the time you work."

"Foreman!" angrily. "Billy Brooks!" Why, he don't know any more about minin' than I do. I'd make a better foreman any day."

"Perhaps, but Mr. Brooks seems to have been the only man faithful to my interests so far, and he will be my foreman, with an advance in wages. Now you may come and get your money, or you can go back to work, just as you choose."

He went on toward the office without again looking toward them. The men hesitated a moment; then three of them followed him. The rest returned to the mine. After that there was little trouble with them so long as they were not left by themselves.

The next few days he passed for the most part at the mouth of the furnace, helping and overlooking the ore as it was poured in, but in spite of his care and watchfulness the result was not satisfactory, and the newly made pig iron was carried round and cast back into the furnace, to be once more melted. Again and again was this done, and, though the results were often improvements on the preceding ones, they were not what he hoped and was striving for.

So he worked and experimented, the loaned capital growing smaller and smaller, until at last he began to discharge the more shiftless of the men. At the end of November his working force had dwindled to ten men and himself and his money to less than $100. During the last few weeks but little time had been given to sleep. Through the day he worked with the men—silent, watchful, untiring—and most of the nights were given to study and the devising of new experiments. Something was lacking, some little point which he had missed. Perhaps it was in the ore, perhaps in the furnace, possibly somewhere else, only he had missed it, and yet the secret was hovering at his very finger tips; he was sure of that.

The ten men remaining to him were the pick of the neighborhood, in whom he was every day growing to repose more confidence. They were all hard working and tried to meet his wishes, and in a way they were beginning to understand that he was passing through a crisis of his life. One evening after an unusually hard day, as Longmore almost staggered toward his office, Brooks followed him, laying a detaining hand upon his shoulder.

"THEY'RE THE FINEST I EVER SAW."

"Look here, Mr. Longmore," he said anxiously, "you just leave that office alone tonight an' go into your room to bed. You're runnin' yourself out. An'—an'," hesitating a little, "if you don't mind, me an' the men have been talkin' about you some lately. We've been workin' pretty steady an' ain't a bit hard up now, so if it'll be any—any easier you might let our pay lie over a month or two. We don't mind, an'"—

Longmore swung round and grasped his hand.

"Thank you for this, Mr. Brooks," he exclaimed, his eyes moistening. "You don't know how I appreciate it just now. Tell the men so. But I shall not take advantage of your friendship. It has been something of a strain with me lately, I don't mind admitting that, but another day or two will decide the matter one way or the other. I was up all last night, working and thinking, and am going to make one last trial, a bolder one. I cent my last $50 away this morning, and the things will be here on the train tomorrow morning. The next day will decide whether we keep on or close and whether—But good night. Be on hand at daybreak. I shall work in the office tonight, but after this will sleep."

The next morning he was on the little platform when the train came and took his package straight to the office. Soon after he went to the mouth of the furnace, where the men were throwing in ore, the package under his arm. All day he worked there with them, feverishly, but the next day when he went below to watch the result, when the molten iron was released, he was calm.

But as he watched a strange light began to glow in his eyes. As soon as the bars were sufficiently cool he took several of them to the station platform, addressing them to Mr. Brayton. Then he went to the office and wrote a long letter, and it lacked but two days of the year's end.

The 1st of January the letter was answered by Brayton in person. His face seemed unusually excited as he swung to the platform even before the train stopped.

"Are those bars fair samples?" he demanded.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, well, well!! I'd never have believed it—never in this world. They're the finest I ever saw and mean a fortune. But I can't accept your proposition, Longmore, to take over the plant with you again as foreman. No, no! We'll run it half and half, my capital against your discovery and services. And we'll increase the capacity and the working force to 300 men. You'll want a superintendent now, Longmore, and foremen for the different departments. You'd better hire them at once."

"They're already at hand, sir, men on whom I can depend and who will make our interests their own."

"Good! That's the kind we want. Now let's go to the office and consider plans for the increase. Why," explosively, "it's a fortune and the most unbelievable thing I ever heard of. Then we'll run up home and see Helen. She'll be glad, and—er—I won't say another word."

SCIENCE VS. LIQUOR.

The Former Placing the Latter in Disreputable Light.

An interesting address by Dr. E. O. Taylor, of Boston, delivered before the recent Anti-Saloon League convention, held at St. Louis, Mo., gives the keynote for American temperance reform. Dr. Taylor spoke on the subject: "Science versus Liquor," and said in part:

"According to conservative estimate, 180,000 people are destroyed every year in this country, directly or indirectly, for lack of very little and very simple knowledge touching the nature of alcohol and its principal effects upon the living human body.

"We have temperance sentiment enough in this country, such as it is. The brewer, distiller, drinker and drunkard all alike believe in temperance, none of them believe in intemperance, and that is temperance sentiment. The trouble is that it is not intelligent, up-to-date, or scientific sentiment.

"The question with scientific men is not distinctively one of beer or whisky, but the question of alcohol, wherever alcohol may be found. What is this thing we call alcohol? Is it good or bad in its nature? Does its character, not its abuse, so-called, adequately account for the badness of its fruitage? Let me refer to a notable fact. In Europe they have an international temperance congress. It started out a few years ago to discuss the abuse of beer and whisky—how to dispose of such abuse. Quite recently that congress changed its name to the International Anti-Alcohol congress, which is now discussing the inherent badness of alcohol—how to dispose of its use for beverage purposes.

"Just as long as the people—the masses—consider liquor as good in its nature and its abuse only bad, will they go on drinking it in spite of any restriction you may advise, and just so long will voters and legislators go on temporizing with the traffic legislatively. I would not have a whit less of prohobitory legislation, but a thousand fold more of fundamental educational work by which to sustain such legislation.

"Dr. Hadley, president of Yale university, recently said: 'As soon as the common people get into their possession the principal facts touching the nature of alcohol, they will drive every saloon out of the country.' To impart that necessary knowledge is consequently the first duty of the hour—not the last. But such a process implies education—scientific education, and that of a majority of voters. Such education is only possible ultimately through the medium of the public school system where scientific instruction can be adequately given, and where the majority of the future voters are to be found.

"The inexorable logic of Dr. Hadley's statement, then is that the faithful, systematic, progressive, scientific teaching concerning the nature and consequent effects of alcohol, beginning with the primary grades and continuing through the habit forming period of the intermediate to the high school, is essential to the ultimate and permanent overthrow of the drink habit and traffic in this country."

A New German Temperance Feature.

In Berlin, Germany, a system of hand-carts has recently been established in the streets in the interests of temperance. These carts supply, in scrupulously acceptable manner, milk, tea, coffee, mineral drinks and light eatables at very low prices. An especially good business is done in the neighborhood of cab-stands, railway-stations and factories, and as a means of combating alcohol the carts are found to be most successful.

Temperance Posters in Denmark.

A number of Danish physicians have recently become alarmed at the gravity of the drink evil in their land, and have adopted the British method of temperance campaign in causing large posters to be placed in all railway stations throughout the country proclaiming alcohol as a stupefying and dangerous poison, and the cause of most of the insanity and crimes in Denmark.

Swiss Against Absinthe.

The Swiss government has been asked by 168,341 persons to suppress the manufacture and sale of absinthe in that country. That subtle green spirit is held responsible for much human wretchedness wherever it is freely used, so this wholesale prohibition is to be submitted to a vote of the whole Swiss people.

The Foe of Labor.

"The foe of labor is not capital but ignorance and vice. In the whole English-speaking world, at least, its worst enemy is drink. More than a combination of all the employers, the saloon has the power to impoverish and degrade the workingmen."—Bishop Spalding of Peoria, Essay on "Labor and Capital."

Prosperity and Prohibition.

Mayor Waterhouse of Pasadena, Cal., thus sums up the results of prohibition in that noted Pacific coast city: "No license has caused more people to make their home in Pasadena than any other one thing."

Alone.

"Hain't you got no grandma, Willie?"
Lisped a little bit o' boy,
At the sobbing of a gamin—
SOBBING in a world of joy!
Broken-hearted on the greensward,
Lay the waif in sorrow's storm;
Hushed and wonder-eyed, the children
Flocked about his weeping form!

"Hain't you got no grandma, Willie?
Is she visatin' today?
Grandma always kisses trouble
And the squeegee things away!
When I bump myself or cut me,
She 'ist tells me not to cry;
Sobbing does not help the trouble;
It will be all right bime by!"

Hain't you got no grandma, mister—
O ye man, in sorrow's mart?
Hain't you got no grandma, madam—
Woman with the aching heart?
Is there no one near to soothe you,
None to wipe away your tears?
Not one loving hand, caressing?
None to calm your surging fears?

"Hain't you got no grandma," reader?
"Is she visatin' to-day?"
Or, perhaps, she's gone forever—
Gone forever, and alway!

* * *

Let us stop our weeping, children—
"She 'ist tells us not to cry;
Sobbing does not help the trouble;
It will be all right bime by!"

When about to say something unkind of anyone, try touching the tips of your index and little fingers. After you have done this, if you can, don't say it.

Some people giv their children so much advice, they never have an original thought of their own.

It is always a good plan to get a better job before you throw up the one you have.

I see that the crisis in the Chicago street car situation has come again. Somebody is going to get slapped on the wrist in one of these crises yet.

Save your dollars now. Christmas is coming, when they slip away like a flock of quail from a pointer dog.

Never tell a woman how sweet she looks. Tell her how sweet she is.

One way to get even with your enemy is to give him the tip on the races that the stable boy handed you.

Did you ever see a pessimist dodge a bicycle just after he has been telling you there isn't anything in life worth living for, anyhow?

Sometimes you can borrow money of a fellow when he doesn't feel like himself.

There is a great mystery out in my town. This morning I followed a wagon track on the sidewalk for ten minutes. Then all of a sudden I saw where the blamed horse, or whatever it was that was pulling the wagon, or whatever he was pulling, had jumped over the fence and left a lot of tracks. The fence was all right and too high for anything to vault except a flying machine. How in the dickens did that horse, or whatever it was, get over the fence and get back again without breaking down the fence or smashing the wagon, or whatever it was he was pulling? You can search me! I spent fifteen minutes trying to figure it out and then came on down town to tell it to you.

A LESSON FROM FRANCE.

The Present Generation Benefited and Future Generations Provided For.

France has under way a far-sighted forest policy which will require two centuries before the work reaches its greatest efficiency. The plan covers the reforestation of vast tracts of denuded land, and the work is in the hands of four thousand trained foresters in the employ of the republic and a large number of men employed by the communal governments.

Consul General R. P. Skinner tells how this work is being done by a great nation keenly alive to the necessity of doing it, and determined that it shall be done well, though years and centuries are consumed in the doing. Colbert, in the reign of Louis XVI, exclaimed, "France will perish for lack of wood!" and his prophecy was coming true a century and a half later, when the French people waked to the peril which threatened them, and called a halt.

Their forests were vanishing as are those in the United States today, but the depletion had gone even further than it has yet gone in America. France commenced protecting and restoring its wooded areas nearly a century ago, and has stuck to the task ever since, but so much yet remains to do that Mr. Skinner says in his report:

"The work is slow. It will require probably two hundred years to bring it up to its maximum effectiveness. But the time is foreseen when existing damaged forests will be reconstituted, and when all the waste spaces will be replanted to the point of proper proportion to insure the conservation of the water supply and to furnish the timber and wood required by the population. The effect upon private land owners of this public work has been most salutary. Where absolutely bald mountains have been replanted very surprising local results are now visible to all observers. This is especially true in the Hautes Alps, which had the unenviable reputation of being the poorest department in France, and is, in fact, one of the few from which the United States has received several thousand French immigrants. There are now many artificially planted forests in this department of twenty-five years' standing, and in the bottom land below conditions have so improved that a state of general prosperity prevails."

The plan of the French foresters is comprehensive. It embraces the care of forest land, planting of trees, fixation of dunes near the coasts to prevent the drifting of sand upon agricultural land, correction of mountain streams, regulation of pasture land, utilization of water in pastoral and forest regions and the surveillance of river fishing and fish culture. This comprehensive service extends to every part of the republic.

The area of the national forests of the United States exceeds twentyfold the national and communal forests of France, but the problems are the same. France has been longer at the work, and when it began its forests were in a worse condition than ours are now, but not worse than our privately owned forests will be if present methods continue.

Consul General Skinner concludes his report with this suggestion to those in America who have shown sufficient interest in the matter to write him on the subject.

"If correspondents could penetrate, as the writer has done, the almost inaccessible mountain villages of this country, and there discover the enthusiastic French forester at work, applying scientific methods which cannot come to complete fruition before two or three hundred years, they would retire full of admiration and surprise, and would carry the lesson back to the United States."

HOW MUCH FOOD IS NECESSARY?

Curious Experiments in Eating and Maintaining Strength.

The most men and women eat more than is necessary to keep in good working condition is a doctrine repeatedly emphasized by Professor Russell H. Chittenden, of the Sheffield Scientific School, and he recurs to it in the current "Popular Science Monthly." This investigator's opinions are based on precise measurements, both of food and strength, though in the majority of cases his observations have extended over a period of only a few weeks. He now reinforces his argument by evidence afforded by a much longer interval.

Horace Fletcher, who was carefully studied by Professor Chittenden in 1903, and who had then practiced abstinence with excellent results for about five years, was in New Haven last summer, a fresh opportunity was given for subjecting him to rigid tests. Mr. Fletcher declared that he had not been in training, nor had he accustomed to especially strenuous exercise, and yet he displayed an astonishing degree of physical endurance. For instance, he lifted a weight of three hundred pounds three hundred and fifty times in succession, and, according to the director of the Yale gymnasium (who canducted the examination), still had some power in reserve at the end of the performance. Never has any Yale athlete done more that half as well, the best previous record at the gymnasium being 175 "lifts." Mr. Fletcher is now fifty-nine years old, has gained twenty pounds in the last four years, and says that he never takes more than two ounces of meat, eggs, or other food of a similar nature in the course of a day.

Most men are impelled to eat by a variety of motives. The knowledge that nourishment is necessary is one. Hunger supplies another, and mere pleasure is different enough from these two to be considered a third. Habit, of course, has something to do with the matter, and the chance for visiting with one's family or friends furnishes an additional reason, and even curiosity (about new dishes) also plays a part. All of these motives are usually thought to be worthy ones, and they are likely to continue to control the conduct of men and women for ages to come. Very few persons except invalids are content to eat according to rule.

Nevertheless, Professor Chittenden has made out a pretty strong case. His observations have not been limited to Mr. Fletcher. He has had a chance to watch a good many persons, among them a lot of soldiers, lent by the government for the purpose. The food they took was carefully weighed, and an ingenious plan was invented for finding out how much was absorbed into the system and how much was undigested. Repeated tests of physical strength were made, too, in order to ascertain the working capacity of the persons experimented with. It seems to be certain that most people can get along with less food than they usually eat, and that some are really benefited by limiting their indulgence. The food should be wholesome and appetizing, and should be carefully chewed, but a restriction in the amounts is liable to do good rather than harm. The discovery is interesting in many ways, but it is chiefly important to the poor, for it shows that they can live on somewhat less than they have supposed.

Dancing All the Physical Exercise Woman Needs

By DR. ROBERTSON WALLACE.

It appears to be very generally taken for granted that the practice of athletics by woman is necessary for the physical salvation of the race. She is urged to go in for a bewildering variety of physical culture movements, active and passive forms of exercise, ball punching, lawn tennis, golf, cricket and hockey, with a view to preserving her own health, and preventing the degeneration of posterity. The modern woman is to save mankind by retrieving the fallen physique of the race. The white woman's burden is the cradle of humanity, which in future is to be filled only with the offspring of mothers who possess the beauty of Helen of Troy, the symmetry of Venus, the endurance of Diana, and the mental powers of Minerva. The future of mankind is to be assured by the immensity of the maternal muscular development and the child's grip on life to be fostered by dumb-bells and perfected with punch-balls.

So far as women are concerned, the methods of physical culture are being boomed just a trifle too loudly. Ever since Eve first stepped upon the planet women have done very well indeed. Primitive woman expanded her chest and contracted her biceps without the use of any apparatus, and from sheer force of necessity. Probably she jumped for joy and danced in rags just as her daughters do to this day. She had need to be fleet of foot to escape the attentions of undesirable saurians and ineligible suitors. In a word she got all the muscular exercise that was good for her. She practiced physical culture as M. Jourdain talked prose, without knowing it; and that her methods were quite satisfactory is proved by the enduring qualities of most of her progeny, many of whom are perhaps to their surprise, still extant.

The world has been made what it is, and history has been not only made but made possible by those great men whose names are familiar to every schoolboy. Those strong men who have carved the world into its present shape, and left the impress of their powerful personalities in every quarter of the rugged globe, were the children of mothers who, so far as we can ascertain, gave no particular heed to the scientific culture of their muscles, and neglected to take, I fear, a well-balanced diet.

I am often tempted to wonder what substitutes for the Ling exercises, or the different kinds of Home Exercisers, were devised by the strenuous mothers of Julius Caesar and Alexander the Great.

How is it that in what we are pleased to call the dark ages, when women were supposed to take no muscular exercise and almost to draw their breath only at a venture, the race did not degenerate and altogether die out? The truth of the matter is that human nature is the same today as it was when humanity first made its bow to the planet. There were as many light hearts in the dark ages as there are heavy hearts in the ages of light. Women's first step on this planet was taken, we feel sure to the music of the spheres. It was the first step in that dance which she was subsequently to lead all mankind. Woman's development began in a dance; it will be maintained and perfected by the dance, and it will end in a dance. In a word, dancing has been woman's chief delight since her feet first touched the springy turf in the dim beginnings of time. All the little mothers of great men ran, leaped, skipped and danced, as all but poor cripple children do to this day. Dancing is the one exercise most natural to, and last to be given up by, women. The grande dames of history were great because they danced.

No amount of lawn-tennis, golf, cricket, or hockey, however assiduously pursued by women, will make the race one iota stronger to-day than it has been in the past before athletics for women were dreamed of.

Man-Jury Swayed by Pretty Woman

By MAGISTRATE LEROY B. CRANE, New York City.

Are jurors swayed by psychological or physical influences in meting out justice in the case of a young and beautiful woman?

This is a question that has been brought to my mind of late, but it is in reality a subject as old as the thoughts of men.

How far are 12 men physically able to act as unbiased judges of facts where a weeping and attractive young woman is concerned? How far can they be trusted to render a fair and impartial verdict when she sits downcast at the bar of justice? I say the majority of jurors cannot be trusted at all.

The majority of men are liable to be swayed from facts where the sentimental side of life is shown. Whether a woman is attractive or not men are often inclined toward clemency with the fairer sex, especially when the prisoner has an appearance of trouble and care and when her history shows the burdens of life cast upon her.

In the case of pretty women jurors are physically unable to withstand the onslaught of a woman's smiles or tears.

The tendency of men toward women—physically, mentally, morally—is to act in her favor in a court of justice. It is only natural. There is some subtle physical influence which, I believe, in many cases creeps from the beautiful woman in distress at the bar and to the men sitting in judgment upon her. And, after all, it may be but the innate sense of chivalry. In America, at least, we hold our women so high that our first feeling is one of chivalrous desire to aid them.

In England, it is true there are few women acquitted or dealt leniently with in comparison with the number in America. The Englishman regards woman as a chattel; he is stirred by no generous, chivalrous impulse to aid her. On the other hand, he looks down upon woman to an extent that he would scarcely consider her rights at all.

The psychological significance of a woman's testimony upon American jurors is apt to be overrated by a casual reading of the testimony in the case. I am not psychologist enough to go into the details of these effects, but you have only to look up the number of acquittals of pretty and attractive women to realize that men jurors are loath to convict a beautiful woman, or, as far as that goes, any woman who shows sufficient signs of womanliness.

To state the subject too baldly may shock the sensibility of righteous men who have served as jurors and who consider themselves eligible to serve in that capacity. However, there is nothing for any one to take offense at the statement that the physical influence to some extent takes precedence over the mental.

SAILING OF THE FLEET.

The eyes of the world will follow the fleet of the United States on its voyage of 14,000 miles round the Horn to San Francisco. On Monday morning last, the sixteen great battle ships lay at anchor in Hampton Roads. Thousands of the friends of the officers and 15,000 seamen, making up their complement were there to bid them "bon voyage." At 8 o'clock, the President's yacht, the Mayflower, was greeted by a salute of 21 guns from Fortress Monroe, followed by the roar of 21 guns on each battleship. The yards of every ship were manned, and as the Mayflower steamed between the two columns, the President standing on the bridge, saluted the cheering seamen. The Mayflower anchored in the center of the fleet, and Rear-Admiral Evans, and the captains of all the ships, went aboard to pay their respects to President Roosevelt. In twenty minutes they returned, and at exactly 10 o'clock the message was flashed from the Connecticut: "Get under way immediately. Follow the flagship." The Mayflower weighed anchor, proceeding to the end of the column, circled and came back to the head, taking the lead. The flagship Connecticut followed the Mayflower, and the other ships, in single file obeyed the orders of their commander. At the Virginia capes, the President's yacht came to anchor, and as each battleship passed by moving at the speed of 10 knots an hour, again the salute of 21 guns was given. Again the Mayflower weighed anchor and started for Washington, and the fleet passed out upon the waters of the Atlantic. Wireless messages passed between the President and Rear-Admiral Evans, and up to midnight the fleet kept in touch with the shore by the same medium of communication. The fleet is expected to be at Trinidad from December 24 to December 29; Rio De Janiero, January 11 to 21; Punta Arenas, the most southern point of South America, January 21 to February 5; Callao, February 10 to February 15; to reach Magdalena Bay, Lower California, Mexico, March 14, to remain there for target practice for thirty days, and reach San Francisco, May 1.

There is not a ship in the line that has ever been in the smoke of battle. Not one of them was in being when Dewey fought at Manilla and Schley at Santiago. All are new, models of modern design and armament—"examples of the aggressiye, seagoing navy, which the President has declared to be so essential to the peace of the nation," bound, in their white garb of peace, on a pacific voyage to the Pacific Ocean, and probably round the world.

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JANUARY 2 1908. NUMBER 44

NEW YEAR GREETINGS.

From Rev. J. B. Shoup, of Fitzgerald, Georgia.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

The many kindnesses of the years gone by give assurance that once more I shall be permitted, through your columns, to send Holiday greetings to a host of Garrett county friends, among your patrons May good cheer dwell in the homes, and fill the hearts of all these! I know not another community anywhere among whom this happy season brings a fuller measure of innocent joys. It would be a delight to know that weather conditions were favorable, so that both social visitation, and the services of Sunday schools and God's house might be enjoyed in the fullest measure.

Christmas brought unusual fullness of enjoyment to this community. The day was truly ideal; bare foot children and ladies in white! The city was simply hilarious; more gimppowder was burned in Fitzgerald that day than at Bunker Hill, I am sure. We found it difficult to get our horse through the streets, in our afternoon drive to show our grandchildren the merry sights. Santa Claus did not miss our door, though we are a long mile from the town's center. A ten-dollar dolly was among "Jolly Old Nick's" deliveries. How we wish our Maryland friends might have been with us. Snow and ice for you, good friends; bright sun, balmy air, bird-songs and roses for us. And the Lord giveth all! Kindest greetings.

J. B. SHOUP AND FAMILY.

READY FOR LIQUOR FIGHT.

Anti-Saloon League Has a Drastic Bill.

Next week the Anti-Saloon League will muster its forces and descend upon the Legislature. It is then that the real fight to secure the passage of the local-option bill advocated by the League will begin. For the purpose of convenience and to show that it means business, the League will open up headquarters on the office floor of Carvil Hall. There some of its representatives will be in charge until either the bill has been passed or the session of the Legislature has expired.

Mr. William H. Anderson, State superintendent of the League, said that owing to the fact that the Legislature is expected to do very little work, outside perhaps of the appointment of committees, the organization which he represents will not send any representatives before it this week. He will, however, go down during the early days of next week and personally take charge of the fight.

The bill which the League will ask to have passed is now being prepared by one of the ablest lawyers in the State, and will in all probablity be ready for submission within the next two weeks. From every standpoint it will be one of the most drastic measures that the anti-liquor people have ever asked any Legislature to enact. In discussing its provisions Mr. Anderson stated that he had advocated a strict measure for the reason that he realized a fight would be made against any bill the League would propose, and that the matter had just as well be threshed out in the beginning.

"I know," said Mr. Anderson, "that we are going to encounter all kinds of opposition, but I am confident that there are lots of people who will favor a bill that is strict who would not favor one which covers only a part of the ground. Prohibition that does not prohibit will not satisfy many temperance advocates, therefore in drafting the bill we have endeavored to satisfy the most ardent advocates of local option. If we lose we will be no worse off than if the bill had been more lenient, whereas if we win we will be in a much better position with a strict measure than with one less rigid."

With a view of engendering anti-saloon sentiment, and for the purpose of making its fight more effective, the Anti-Saloon League of the State has gone into the co-operative paper scheme of the National League. The scheme contemplates the publication in Chicago of a newspaper entitled the American Issue, which was formerly published by the Ohio League. It has been combined with a number of State papers, and hereafter the edition will be gotten out for each of the several States. The first edition will be issued next week.

Mr. Hartly, of Meyersdale, Pa., is visiting Mr. Roy Hammond in Oakland.

THE FAVORED SECTION.

Sketches from the Famous Eastern Shore of Maryland.

To the Editor of The Republican;

Many of my friends and acquaintances of Garrett county have asked me to write them giving them my impressions of this country, its climate, resources, etc.

It would be quite a task to write so many personal letters, and as most of them are readers of your paper, and as this sketch might be of interest to many of your readers, will you kindly give space for its publication.

One coming to this point could take train No. 2 at Oakland, and arrive at Camden station, Baltimore, in time to catch the steamer for this place the same evening. The steamer Cambridge leaves pier No. 4 at the foot of Lexington street every evening at 4:15, crosses the bay to Claiborne where you transfer to the B. C. & A. R. R., reaching Salisbury about 9.30 p. m. The cheaper way is to take the steamer Virginia at pier No. 3 which carries you down the bay, crosses over the upper end of Tangier Sound and thence up the Wicomico River land you at Salisbury next day about nine o'clock a. m.

Salisbury is a very busy town. It is a central point for a large portion of the Peninsula. It contains (including suburbs) a population of about 9,000 inhabitants. Several wholesale and retail stores, about sixty in all. Also several manufacturing plants of various kinds giving employment to all who want work. This is pre-eminently a town of homes. Splendid houses and large shady lawns abound and the general air of thrift and comfort convinces one that so good a town must have a fine surrounding country to feed it.

In the few weeks I have been here has called me to many parts of the Peninsula and wishing to gain as much knowledge as possible, have talked with many farmers and truckers, in the main, people who have no land to sell, and no "ax to grind." There are different qualities of soil. The low lands are principally clay and are fine for general farming. The higherlands are very sandy and are especially fine for trucking. One prominent farmer has had experience on both kinds of soil says he can make two to three dollars on sandy to one on clay.

Many of the larger farms are being sub-divided, especially in the trucking districts. It does not require a large acreage to make a living. I could give many examples but space forbids.

I will, however, give my readers an idea of what can be done on a small farm. Going down the Wicomico river the other day I landed at White Haven (about 20 miles down) and went across the country to Nanticoke on the Nanticoke river. This point of land is about eight miles wide and only a few feet above tide water. This is an ideal small farm section. One can see twenty-five to thirty houses from any point point of view. I stayed ever night there with a man owning 10 acres of land. He told me his corn would make 75 bushels, shelled, per acre. That he had 750 bushels of tomatoes on two acres and fruit and other crops in proportion He has a splendid residence well furnished and splendid out buildings. Does a little fishing and lives in ease and comfort. Some people from the mountains have looked at this land and called it too low. There can't be much wrong with land producing such crops and only a few acres need be cultivated to have a good living. One farmer near Salisbury has 18 acres of land for which he paid $1,500. This year his crop brought $2,500: Melons, $800; sweet potatoes, $1,200; berries, $500.

Now one examples of farming or trucking on a large scale. Mr. W. H. Allen, who owns a large farm one mile south west of Salisbury. and is known all over the United States as a grower of strawberry plants "true to name," in a recent interview gave me the following facts and figures. He owns and cultivates 600 acres of land. His principal business has been growing plants for the market. This past season, however, he grew and marketed 100,000 quarts of strawberries, 41,000 half-barrel baskets of cucumbers, 1,700 six-gallon crates of peaches, 35 car loads of cantaloups; 34 car loads of water melons; 500 barrels of sweet potatoes, etc. The total value of farm products for the season was $60,000 of which $20,000 was net gain. This year (1908) his plantings will be still heavier. Mr. Allen told me when he began here 17 years ago he was not worth a dollar. Summming up, I do not see any difference in the soil of these highly cultivated farms and the lands that are still being sold at comparatively low prices except as they have been cultivated and cared for.

There is but little natural grass here, but there need be no lack of the best forage for live stock when corn, cow peas and crimson clover grow as they do here. My observations in the far West where soil conditions are very similar, convinces me that alfalfa, Kaffir corn and sorgum would all do well here and and be valuable acquisitionss to the forage crop. Then the silo almost unknown here would be of much profit to the enterprising farmer. But as all your readers are not farmers, a few more words and I'll have done with this subject. To persons who contemplate looking over this section of the country would say, we have a number of real estate firms, who take delight in showing you around. Prominent among them is the firm of J. A. Jones & Co., who are pleasant, well informed gentlemen, who keep a lot of good rigs and horses and will drive you all over the surrounding country free of charge. They publish a lot of literature giving much information which is free for the asking.

This is an interesting country at this season of the year. Holly, myrtle and mistletoe grow in great profusion, and any girl who wants to be kissed under the mistletoe can hardly go amiss as every doorway, archway and chandelier is decorated with it. I never saw such a profusion of holiday decorations. The weather is delightful. Clear days and frosty nights abound with an occasional wind and rainstorm from the Atlantic. At this writing (Dec. 26), we have had no snow except a little flurry on the night of the 4th, which all melted early next morning.

Maryland is certainly the biggest little state in the Union. Stretching from the Atlantic across this wonderful peninsula, the Chesapeake Bay, the rich Western Shore, over the foot hills of the Alleghanies, clear over their highest peaks and across the high plateau of Garrett known as the Glades. What other little state can show such a diversity of industries, climate and scenic effects? Well may Marylanders be proud.

To one who has spent their life in a hill country and the high prairies of the West, there are many things in this low country strangely interesting. The great number of sails boats on the Bay carrying huge cargoes of lumber, coal and other commodities, and the small oyster boats by the dozen are interesting sights to a mountaineer. Oyster men say that they have much trouble to market their products this winter, prices are so low and the demand light.

Waiting for a boat at the Nanticoke wharf the other morning I visited an oyster house. It was not yet day light, and the long room, in which about fifty negroes were at work shucking oysters, was poorly lighted with tallow candles, torches and lanterns. The dim light, smoky air and dusky forms, reminded one of some of the scenes in Dante's Inferno. But the weird effect was dispelled somewhat by the cheerful songs and laughter of the darkies. Surely they are the best contented people on earth.

I have been asked to report on the healthfulness of this section. I find comparatively few cases of catarrh (nasal), bronchitis or pulmonary affections, and I am told there is no malarial and but little typhoid fever here. For an all the year round home it is likely about as enjoyable as one could find. There is much more I would like to say to my friends through this medium, but for fear of exhausting the patience of the editor I will close.

SAYS END OF THE WORLD IS HERE

Terrible Program for 1908 Prepared by Prophet Leo J. Spangler.

Leo J. Spangler, of York, Pa., who has been phophesying for the past 20 years and who for the past 11 years has been issuing annual bulletins, has announced his prophecies for 1908.

When Spangler first began to prophesy his statements were discredited and rather inclined to be scoffed at, but for the past few years the fulfillment of many things which he seemingly has foretold has caused his statements to be looked forward to with much interest.

Spangler has predicted many horrors, among them the Baltimore fire, the San Francisco earthquake, and last year he predicted the great money stringency which would hit the country and knock it out of gear.

He also made a statement to the effect that the United States would go to war with Japan and all the nations would be involved; that the United States would be victorious and ride the high seas triumphantly. In consequence our nation will be the peace dictator of the world.

The recent outgoing of the American fleet from Hampton Roads has spurred Spangler to issue his bulletin for 1908, in which he predicts greater evils to befall the nations of the earth.

Among them will be:

The destruction of the world, which occurs during the latter part of December, 1908. The exact time he does not stipulate.

There will be great troubles with the nations.

There will be many famines and earthquakes.

Mountains will crumble.

Islands will sink and many cities on the Atlantic Slope will be destroyed.

He predicts the destruction of Boston and the burning of New York.

There will be a great falling off in crops and the once-boasted prosperity of the farmer will come to an end.

He alleges that the money stringency will be greater than ever.

That the Treasury of the United States will go broke and that President Roosevelt will have his pile taken away with the skill of a magician.

That the lack of confidence will cause the people to establish pocket banks and carry their money around with them. This will provoke robberies and great enmity among the people.

He predicts the visitation of the plagues mentioned in the Bible, and says that the sting of the locust will mean death.

Towards the last of the year he says the sun will turn black, the moon will be the color of blood, the heavens will be shaken and the stars will drop. Then will be the end.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS FAIR.

Held Three Nights This Week Was A Great Success.

The Fair conducted under the auspices of Garrett Lodge No. 113, Knights of Pythias in the lodge room in Oakland, was a decided success, not only from a financial standpoint, but also as a social affair, nearly every resident of Oakland adding to its success by their presence and support.

The fair opened Monday evening after a notice of but two days. From the first evening the large room was crowded with ladies and gentlemen, who liberally patronized the fancy booth, the fortune teller's tent, the fish pond and the refreshment tables, these several departments being presided over by the young ladies.

The gross receipts amounted to nearly $340, from which some expenses must of necessity be deducted, which leaves the net amount realized in the neighborhood of $300.

STORY OF THE NATIONAL ROADS

Known as "Cumberland Road" From Cumberland to Wheeling.

IT WAS SUBSTANTIALLY BUILT

By the Government Under Supervision of Engineers—The Old Braddock Road Followed Indian Trail. A Timely Road Story.

The following is the conclusion of a most interesting article on the great national road from the pen of Mr. Jacob Brown. The story as told today is complete in itself and is full of interest.

The Cumberland road commenced on the West Side of Will's Creek in the then town, following the line of Braddock's road about five miles, crossing Will's Mountain at Sandy Gap, then with its present line. But about the year 1833 the Eastern line was changed, following Mechanic street, up Will's Creek, through the Narrows then westward towards Frostburg. The first mile post or marker on the road, being of cast iron with two lettered faces, was placed at the corner of Mechanic and Baltimore streets about the year 1834, with one at the end of each mile. The first had this as part of inscription: "131 miles to Wheeling." Some years ago this initial marker was recklessly destroyed. What an outrage upon history. There are yet some of the like monuments standing along the lifeless road. All on the north side. Many have been broken and destroyed. Old acquaintances feel like saluting when passing along by one of them. About the year 1815 the Baltimore Turnpike came into existence, under a charter granted by the State of Maryland. It commenced in the East and ended at Cumberland, thus connecting with Cumberland or National road. In early times there was a continuous road from Baltimore to Wheeling.

Notwithstanding the large sums of money spent on the making of the road in 1830, it was found to be in a worn out condition. Little of it was left, except the rough stone bed. The heavy traffic and travel had reduced it to that impracticable state. The old patching system of repairing here and there, with a few broken stones and coverings with earth would not answer. They would wear and wash away soon. It was seen by thoughtful persons that a new system had to be sought and adopted. The macadamizing plan was decided upon and carried into effect. This was a system invented by John L. McAdams, a distinguished road builder, and engineer. The mode of making such roads was to break up stones into pieces of an egg size and spread them over the roadbed to a considerable thickness; in this case nine inches, and then to have them packed and solidified by the usage of the road. This great national enterprise was commenced about the year 1832, and was done under the supervision of the War Department. Some of the most promising and talented young men of the army were specially selected as engineers, the names of Mansfield, Delefield, McKee, Bliss, Hetsell, Williams, Colquit, and Cass, all West Pointer, engineers, the names of Mansfield, who became a major general in the United States Army. and fell gloriously in the battle at Antietam in 1862. Geo. W. Cass, nephew of the great Senator Lewis Cass, was the last to depart.

Lime stones were quarried whenever they could be obtained, and in some instances drawn five miles or more by teams of four and six horses, and strung along on each side of the road, and then broken by sledge hammers in lumps of 5 to 10 pounds, and then broken into small pieces by round hammers in the hands of laborers in a sitting position. It was very hard and tedious work, but the pay was good, and the working men happy. When the stone were thus broken and strung along in great rows on each side of the road they were then spread evenly over the whole bed by great horse rakes, to the depth of about nine inches. It can be imagined the hardships heavily laden wagons would experience in passing over such a bottom of loose stones. All sorts of strategies had to be used to compel vehicles to pass over these unpacked stones. No doubt there was some old-time swearing in these days by teamsters. However the road in time became packed and solidified, and as smooth as some of the avenues in Washington city.

Its grandest days were from about 1835 to 1845 the finest road in America, and in all probabilities, the world, considering its length, reaching from Baltimore to St. Louis. None other in this country had such a quantity of travel and traffic. The number of wagons, stage coaches, animals, that passed over it daily when in its finest condition, was almost fabulous. In the busy seasons there was a perfect throng all day long, and at night the many taverns or inns would be overflowing with jolly crowds. These were flush times indeed. Money, such as it then was, plenty, everybody employed and happy.

The Baltimore and Ohio railroad reached Cumberland from the east in November, 1842, and there it rested till 1853. In this eleven years the famous pike was a substitute for the present railroad to the Ohio river. Although the traffic and travel that went over the road was amazing and so it was at that time. The many warehouses in Cumberland, especially in the Spring, and of all seasons would be fairly choked with freight for the West, brought by the B. & O. road to be carried over the Cumberland road in great wagons. There were a number of persons who made "wagoning" as it was called, a regular business, with their four and six horse teams. In the busy seasons there were quite a number of irregular wagoners, who would make a trip or two. They were called sharp shooters. They were held in contempt by the regulars. Some of these teamsters were pretty rough characters, especially when on the road, but there were others who were fairly good citizens at home. Considerable drinking in those times, altogether of whisky, at 18 cents a gallon, and 3 cents a drink, pure article of rye or corn. Not one of these old wagoners are now living.

No tolls were charged upon the Cumberland road until the passage of the act of the General Assembly of Maryland, 1831, which authorized two tollgates upon it in the State, and also the appointment of a superintendent at a salary of $500. This was an office much sought and of considerable influence, but it was dispensed with many years ago, with the tollgate system.

Staging so called, just when it commenced on the road, cannot now be accurately given, but it was about the year 1815. The enterprise or business in the beginning was very crude and imperfect. Stage coaches in those early days were called turtle backs, on account of the roof resembling that reptile. They were uncomfortable for travellers, but were about apace with the times. Stages were running between Cumberland and Baltimore, some time before, plying west of Cumberland. In after years came the Troy, and Concord coaches. They were very popular and comfortable and were called post coaches because they carried the U. S. Mail. In their day, they were thought to be as grand as the Pullman cars of our exquisite times. The first coach of the Troy pattern was sent to Cumberland from Philadelphia by James Resides in the year of 1829. It had been won by the owner in a bet on the Presidential election and the winner intended President Jackson should be the first to ride in it from Cumberland to Washington, to take his seat. Charles Howell, an old coachman, was to be the driver. The President-elect came in his own private conveyance. No doubt he was pleased with the new coach, but "by the eternal" he would not ride to Washington in a free conveyance, however inviting and comfortable it might be. So his own plain conveyance, not only carried him to the seat of our Government, but returned him to his home, at the Hermitage eight years later.

However old hickory unbent so far as to allow a portion of his party to christen the virgin stage coach, which had been won on his election to the Presidency. These fine coaches cost from $500 to $600, and contained seats for nine persons, 3 upon each seat, some times one or two out side with the driver. Thomas Shriver, who was engaged in staging brought his ingenuity into use, and invented the elleptical spring, which was a decided improvement on the old method. L. B. Stockton and Jas. Reside were the pioneers in the stage business. Further on came the well known Alpheus Beall, of Cumberland, and some other others not now remembered. At times there were opposition coaches, and competition quite spirited and fare low, but not of long duratiod.

Coach riding was a very pleasant mode of traveling in the summer seasons over the mountains, but the very reverse in the winter. Think of a stage load of men and women in the mountains. with two or three feet of snow, thermometer below zero with no warmth nearer than the next stopping place. These changing places were for the purpose of getting fresh horses in the place of the wearied ones, usually about ten or twelve miles apart. The speed about six miles an hour, but in an emergency ten could be made. The greatest amount of travel and traffic on the roads were for the period between 1842 and 1853. In the latter year the B. & O. railroad reached the Ohio river, which fact made the old road almost a grass plot. In the traveling season it was no extraordinary thing for 100 persons to pass over the Cumberland road, in coaches to the West. Stage owners grew rich and became influential.

Many of the great men of this country passed over the road in early times, especially from the West, among them four Presidents of the United States. The first was Jackson, as already stated. The next, W. H. Harrison, in the month of February, 1841, in mid-winter, with a deep snow. When he reached Cumberland he was nearly exhausted. His pale and fainty appearance is remembered by one at least. He lived but one month after his inauguration. It was believed that his long winter ride over the mountains hurried his lamented death.

The next in line was James K. Polk in the same wintry month. He is remembered to have dined at the noted hotel at Little Meadows in Garrett county, on a Sunday. The last of the four Presidents named was Z. Taylor in the same inclement month in 1849. He rode from Wheeling to Cumberland in one of the large nine-passenger coaches with two or three additional coaches filled with accompanying friends. The writer will give a little personal incident in this connection, which it is hoped may not be out of taste. He was then near the close of his legal studies and was on a visit to his old home country, in the Alleghanies. and was upon the eve of returning to Cumberland. Luckily the Taylor convoy or party came along with a personal friend in it, J. H. C. Mudd. He kindly found a seat for the writer in one of the the coaches, and even introduced him to the occupants. Among them was "Col. Lee, of Virginia," by whose side the writer sat during the ride of 22 miles. Not one word came from the lips of the Colonel. There was one who thought he was not much of a Colonel, as he sat so silent when all aboard had something, more or less to say. But in after years, when the same person became supreme commander of a great Confederate army, the world at large knew, or knew of Colonel Robert E. Lee. President Taylor lived but one-third of his term, and died from a stroke of July heat 1850, Harrison's death on the other hand came from excessive cold weather.

They were worthy of a notice in this paper. They were a jolly lively set of men, proud of their situation; some of them of more importance in their own estimation than the Congressional or cabinet minister riding in the coach below them. They were in some respects pirked men, and their occupations much sought; politics no test; religion not expected; a moderate amount of profanity, and a sprinkle of "Perry Grove" no barrier to employment. They were expected to be reliable and to possess a good share of horse anatomy, and to use the long whip gracefully, but not too much. One of the commandments was "Thou soalt not divy." Yet it was not any better than the old Hebrew decalogue. All of these veterans of the long whip are deceased; the last to depart was Asahel Willison, only a few weeks ago. Of those who have lived and died in Cumberland and are kindly remembered were: Charles Howell, Samuel Luman, Hanson Willison and Jacob Shuck, all good citizens

It is nearly seventy years since Congress made the last appropriation for the old Cumberland road. After that the States through which it passed had control of it. Good many years ago the State of Maryland turned its part over to the counties through which it passed, Allegany and Garrett. Since then the Maryland portion has been under the care and management of these two counties. It is still a prominent highway, but not in as good condition, as it ought to be for the traffic over it. Some think like the country roads, but much more lengthy and wider.

But this old historic road is a very suitable one for the way or bed for an electric trolley road. It is very wide, and the grade quite suitable. It would pass through a prosperous country, well populated, for many miles. Could be extended from Frostburg, through Grantsville (near Salisbury, Pa.) and Petersburg to Uniontown, Pa., a populous and flourishing city. This needed enterprise is on storage and is sure to come sooner or later. There would be no trouble about right of way. And what a gracious and suitable act it would be for the United States to take a share in the proposed improvement upon the road which they initaited one hundred years ago. There could be no reasonable objection to such action. During our Civil War this road was of considerable national use in military movements and in other ways. J. B.

Stockholders' Meeting.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Garrett County Telephone Company of Garrett County will be held at Hoyes, Md., on Monday, January 6th, 1908, at 10 o'clock a. m., for the purpose of electing a Board of Directors for the ensuing year, and transacting other business.

A Business Proposition

Did you ever stop to think, Mr. Business Man, that the news of your business is as much a part of the local events as a wedding or a church fair? The ladies are just as much interested in a new fabric you have on the shelves as they are in any home happening. Your store news and anouncements in these columns will reach a large circle of eager buyers. This will enable you to sell your goods while they are new and fresh and you will not have to sacrifice later at remnant counter prices. Think it over.

WOOD FOR PAPER COSTS TWENTY-SIX MILLIONS.

The Publisher Pays More for His Stock Than He Did Last Year.

Today there is general complaint among publishers that printing paper is constantly growing dearer. In the Middle West many local papers are raising their subscription price 50 per cent in order to pay for the paper. From the time when Gutenberg first used movable type, made of wood, to the present day of metropolitan papers, some of which consume the product of acres of spruce in a single edition, printing has in very large degree depended upon the forest.

In the face of a threatened shortage of timber, the amount of wood consumed each year for pulp has increased since 1899 from 2 million to 3½ million cords. The year 1906 marked an increase of 93,000 cords in the import of pulpwood, the highest average value per cord for all kinds, and a consumption greater by 469,053 cords than that of any previous year.

Spruce, the wood from which in 1899 three-fourths of the pulp was manufactured, is still the leading wood, but it now produces a little less than 70 per cent of the total. How well spruce is suited to the manufacture of pulp is shown by the fact that during a period in which the total quantity of wood used has been doubled and many new woods have been introduced, the proportion of spruce pulpwood has remained nearly constant in spite of the brains upon the spruce forests for other purposes. During this time three different woods, from widely separated regions, have in turn held the rank of leader in the lumber supply.

Since 1899, poplar, which for years was used in connection with spruce to the exclusion of all other paper woods, have increased in total quantity less than 100,000 cords, and is now outranked by hemlock. Pine. balsam and cottonwood are used in much smaller amounts.

New York alone consumes each year over a million and a quarter cords of wood in the manufacture of pulp, or more than twice as much as Maine, which ranks next. Wisconsin, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and Michigan follow in in the order given. Sixty per cent of the wood used in New York was imported from elsewhere, and even so the supply appears to be waning, since the total consumption for the State shows a small decrease since 1905, whereas the other States named have all increased their consumption. Other States important in the production of pulp are: Massachusetts, Minnesota, Ohio, Oregon, Vermont, Virginia and West Virginia.

The average cost of pulp delivered at the mill was $7.21. The total value of the wood consumed in 1906 was $26,400,000. The chief item determining the price of paper is the cost of pulp. An example of the increase price of paper is found in the case of a publisher of a daily in the Middle West, who recently paid $1,200 for a carload of paper. The same quantity and grade of paper cost a year ago but $800.

The chemical process of paper making, which better preserve the wood fiber, are gaining over the mechanical process. In 1899, 65 per cent of the wood was reduced by the mechanical process; in 1906, less than 50 per cent.

All importations of wood for pulp from Canada, and comprised, in 1906, 739,000 cords, nearly all of which was spruce. Four and a half million dollars' worth of pulp was imported in 1906, a slight falling off from 1905.

Circular 120 of the Forest Service contains a discussion of the consumption of pulpwood in 1906, based on statistics gathered by the Bureau of the Census and the Forest Service. The pamphlet can be had upon application to the Forester, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

GOOD ROADS IMPORTANT.

Work Thus Far Done Has Resulted in An Increase In Value of Farms.

Earnest in their desire to secure good roads for the State along the lines laid down by the Maryland State Survey, the people of Maryland have been provided with numerous examples of road construction and the benefits resulting therefrom in the reports furnished by the Survey of work done elsewhere in this country abroad. In line with the authority given them by the law of 1898, the officers of the State Survey have been making extensive investigations. Their reports are conclusive evidence of the great importance of adequate highways.

Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey and New York have already awakened to the importance of road construction. New York only last year provided for a system of public roads that will cost, when completed $50,000,000, and this amount has already been appropriated by the Legislature of that State.

The last Federal census, taken in 1900, shows that there has been an increase in the farm values of the United States amounting to 27 per cent., and that only four States of the Union show a depreciation in farm values. Massachusetts shows the largest percentage of increase in these values, and this increase has developed since the road improvements there were begun. Prior to that time farm values in that State were also depreciating.

Great work along the line of road construction is being done in North Carolina and Georgia, where convict labor is used to advantage. Governor Swanson of Virginia, in preparing his message to the General Assembly of that State, is giving particular attention to the matter of building good roads. It is understood that he will recommend that the General Assembly amend the present road laws so that the State will have to make an appropriation to each county for road improvements, the work to be done by the State and counties jointly, as in Maryland. Governor Swanson will doubtless propose the use of convict labor for this purpose.

Everywhere in Europe great attention is given to the perfecting of a complete system of smooth public highways of easy grades. Even the poorest country or province considers the building of the best possible roads to be, in the long run, the most economical policy. The work is done under engineering supervision and in accordance with the most carefully drawn specifications. "The systems and methods of road construction in every country I visited abroad," said Dr. William Bullock Clark, head of the State Survey, who went to Europe to study the methods of road-building there, "would be a revelation to anyone who is not familiar with the history of State road construction."

Generally speaking, the highways of Maryland are in bad shape. This condition should be attributed in part to the defective ways of construction and a lack of knowledge as to the proper means of administering the appropriations for that work and for repairs. In many cases also the evils have arisen from the relatively small amount of money which has been devoted, or could properly have been given, by the counties for use on the highways.

The large majority of the people, including the county officers in charge of the roads, do not travel far from home and do not know what a first-class road really is and the advantages which it offers. Occasionally, however, when some one does, he is enthusiastic of such roads and deplores the lack of road progress at home. He has had an object-lesson not enjoyed by his neighbors. When the people at large are familiar with good roads there is no doubt, judging by the results in other Stares, that they will be equally impressed with their advantages and will make the neccessary effort to improve all the highways.

The Fever Nurse

By ELLIS O'NEILLE.

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

Our passengers were thinning out as we traveled southward; few had the hardihood to enter that fever infected atmosphere.

When I quitted the train at Grand Junction, to take my place in the one coach waiting on the sidetrack for passengers to Memphis, I felt that I was indeed bidding my last adieu to the world, and my surprise was great when I found that I was not alone. A young girl was still to be my traveling companion. The singular beauty and intelligence of her countenance would have attracted attention at any time or place. But here, and now! Surely there must be some mistake.

Taking a seat near her, I asked her destination.

"Memphis," she answered promptly.

"And may I ask," said I, "what inexorable duty calls you there at this dreadful time?"

"The duty we all owe each other," she answered quietly, "to give help in time of need. Are not you responding to the same call?"

"Yes, yes," I said, "but I am an old man, and my life is all in the past: with you the case is very different. The beauty of youth is in your face, the light of hope in your eyes. Think well, my child, think well, before you lay all this on the altar of a fancied duty."

"I have thought," she said, with a modest dignity which waived further argument. "The work of nursing the sick is not new to me. I am slow to contract disease, and shall use all the necessary precautions."

Before parting from her that day I had asked by what name I should designate her.

"Suppose you call me 'The Gray Sister,'" she replied.

Looking into her blooming face, I said, "No, the name does not suit you. I shall call you 'La Soeur Solitaire,' for I am sure I shall find no other like you."

The name was well chosen. That scourge of the autumn of 1878 brought to the front many heroic spirits, of whom truly the world was not worthy, but in all the band of noble workers I saw none like my "Soeur Solitaire;" none gifted with her wondrous power to soothe and cheer.

The weeks went by, filled with ever increasing horrors, with scenes of woe that may not be told, and griefs too great to name. She passed through all with undaunted spirit. I saw her as often as was possible, for her courage was needed to revive my own; but a day came when I did not find her, and the doctor under whom she had been nursing could not tell where she had gone.

I prepared to make further inquiries, but was prevented by the president of the Howard association, who came to me just then with an urgent appeal for immediate help. He asked me to take one of his nurses and go to a fine old country seat a few miles out. "Before you consent," he added, "I must tell you that it is a perfect charnel house; there were four burials from there yesterday, and every bed is full of fever patients. You see how it is, the fever of '73 was confined to the city; and we thought it would be the same this time, so thousands of people flocked to the suburbs. Old General Hamilton, the soul of hospitality, threw his doors open until his house was full. Last week the fever broke out among them. They tried to get along without calling on us for help, but a messenger came in, just now, to say that the general and his son are both down, the hired nurses have deserted, and things are in a dreadful state."

Wishing to understand whom I was to report to for service, I asked if the mistress of the house was sick also.

"Oh, she is summering in Europe," he answered, "and I suspect she will not break her heart over her husband's loss. A fine old gentleman, but 30 years her senior if he's a day. The messenger said he would not live till morning, and two of the guests are in a dying condition. Here comes the nurse; will you go?"

I consented, and he thanked me warmly, promising to send other nurses as soon as they could be procured.

The evening shades were thickening when we dismissed our conveyance and walked up a stately avenue which led to the spacious mansion. The hall door stood open, and sounds of mourning were heard from within. As we entered some one came down the stairway with a lighted taper in her hand. It was "La Soeur Solitaire." Her face was white as marble, and there were tears on her cheeks, but she welcomed us with a calm voice.

"I thank God you have come," she said; "we are in great distress."

She assigned us our places at once, and she herself went from room to room, ministering to all.

Toward morning I saw that General Hamilton was passing away, and called her to his bedside to see if she could mitigate his distress. He seemed deeply troubled by something, which, owing to the feebleness of his voice, I could not understand. She seemed to know it by intuition; dropping on her knees beside him, she laid her hand on his, and whispered something in his ear. Instantly the troubled look gave way to one of peace. Seeing this, she bowed her head and placed his hand upon it. There it remained until his spirit passed "beyond the gates."

"We will lay him by his wife, in the family vault," she said. "It is under the western hill slope, at the end of the myrtle walk."

She took a massive key from a curtained cabinet, and led the way, we following, down the myrtle walk to the marble sepulcher under the western hill slope. With her own hand she turned the heavy lock, and we entered. The men deposited their burden beside a casket engraved "Caroline Hamilton," and went quickly back to their work. Overcome by the solemnity of the place, I closed my eyes and repeated a part of the burial service. The responses were made in a broken voice, and when I had finished, I saw that the brave girl had abandoned herself to unrestrained emotion. She was kneeling by the woman's coffin, her arms were thrown across it, and her whole frame was shaken by sobs.

"Poor child," I said, "even your great strength can bear no more. You must have rest. Come."

Recovering her composure with a sudden great effort, she said, "Yes, I must go; there is not time for tears; Roger is very ill."

She spoke of young Hamilton; he was, indeed, very ill, so ill that for days we thought he must follow his father; but at last the tide turned, and we knew he would live. When consciousness returned, and he lay in that state of utter prostration which follows the fever, I watched with interest for the effect produced on him by the presence of the young girl, who was evidently no stranger in the house; but his languid eyes betrayed no sign of recognition, and though they followed her every movement, there was in them no expression of surprise or questioning, only a deep contentment which gave place to restlessness in her absence. There was a sick child downstairs who needed her care, and now that Roger Hamilton was convalescent she left him as much as possible to me. One afternoon I found it necessary to administer a narcotic, and, having seen him fast asleep, I went into the next room and lay down for a little much-needed rest. I had fallen into a doze when my attention was arrested by the sound of his voice. Rising upon my elbow, I saw that "La Soeur Solitaire" had come into the room and was standing by his bed. His arms were thrown up on his pillow, just as I had left them, and he had not stirred; though his eyes were open I knew he was only half awake, and that his mind was wandering.

"Beautiful spirit," he was saying, "you leave me so often, and stay away so long, and I cannot find you because I do not know your name. Tell me, bright spirit, by what name may I call you?"

While he rambled on in this strain, she stood motionless, and seemed to be looking far away. After a while she said, very softly, and her voice sounded more like an echo of the past than a part of the present, "I have no name; no name." Then, for the first time since that day in the tomb, she lost her wonderful self-control and, clasping her hands over her face, she left the room, sobbing, "He told me not to call him brother; he said I had no name."

The next week found her tossing on a bed of fever.

All that wealth and skill could do was done for her. She had made her home in many hearts, and those to whom she had been a ministering angel came now and begged the privilege of doing something, anything, for her. The most importunate of these was Roger Hamilton, and I felt that, for some reason unknown to me, he had a better right than others to be near her.

Her attack had been very violent, almost hopeless from the first. As the fatal symptoms increased, and I saw her beautiful young life fading out before me, I felt no idle curiosity to know what she had chosen to conceal, but I could not put aside the feeling that I was responsible for the knowledge that had come to me by accident, and that I might use it to allay misery, if not to create happiness.

But how? Should I take Roger Hamilton into my confidence? He had grown daily in my esteem, and a common anxiety had drawn us close together. He was with me a great deal now, constantly in waiting near the sick girl's room. One night as we sat together and talked of her I was impelled to tell him of the scenes in his father's tomb, and at his own bedside. Had my words been daggers aimed at his breast, I think they could not have inflicted keener pain. I was alarmed by their effect upon his nervous system, weakened as it was by sickness and watching; but, after a time, he regained composure and thanked me for my confidence.

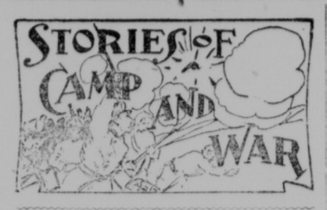
"In return," he said, "I will tell you all I know of her history, though I cannot do so without speaking of myself, for in her pain and my remorse you have seen the fruits of my own violent and, at one time, wholly ungovernable temper. Years ago my mother found, in an orphan asylum in New Orleans, a little girl who was crying bitterly for her mother. The poor woman had been buried from the almshouse only the day before. No one knew more of the child, not even her name.

"Mother was crying, too, having lately lost a little daughter in whom her fond heart was bound up. When the orphan child saw tears on another face she dried her own and, pressing close to mother, stroked her black dress tenderly. She was a thin, homely little thing, with no suggestion of beauty except in her large dark eyes. These may have resembled my sister's eyes, but I think it was the child's mute sympathy that went like balm to my mother's sore heart. We brought the little girl to our home, where, with my father's consent and approval, she was introduced as an orphaned relative. 'It is no untruth,' said my gentle mother to me, 'the sons and daughters of sorrow are bound together by a tie stronger than the ties of blood.' The child seemed to be about three years old. She knew only the pet name, 'Lassie,' by which her mother had called her, and we gave her no other. She was known as Lassie Hamilton, and grew up to believe herself the niece of my father and mother. She called them uncle and aunt, but her warm little heart must have yearned for a closer tie of kinship, for she always called me brother, and on me she lavished that wealth of self-sacrificing love which we sometimes see little sisters give to brothers older than themselves. I was five years older than Lassie, a big boy with a willful temper which was not improved by those conditions of life which surrounded me as the only child and the heir to a large fortune. Poor Lassie was often the victim of my temper, though I think I loved her as much as if she had been my own sister. At the time I am going to tell you of she was about 12 years old, outwardly unattractive, but remarkably intelligent, and high spirited enough to have been a princess. Mother had died two years before, and my father had married a beautiful and imperious young woman, who conceived a strong prejudice against this adopted child of our house, though she never knew that the object of her dislike was not my father's niece. Lassie would have gone away had it not been for her devotion to me. How poorly was it repaid! One day we had a dispute over a game of chess, and I flew into a rage. My temper, which had known no restraint since mother's death, on this occasion passed all bounds. I told her not to call me brother, that I was not even her cousin, and she had no right to the name of Hamilton; that she was the child of a pauper and had no name. Many times since I have wished God had stricken me blind before I saw the look that came into her face, but I was too angry to think of it then.

"Lassie was not at supper that evening, or at breakfast the next morning. Father inquired about her, and I heard a servant say she had gone into the city to visit a schoolmate. I was quite willing, by this time, to acknowledge myself in the wrong and beg her forgiveness, but I was ashamed to meet her and confess that I had broken a promise to my dead mother. So a week passed before I went to bring her home. But she was not with her friend, and had been there only one day and night. Greatly alarmed, I went to my father, and found him reading a letter postmarked Cincinnati. It was from Lassie. She thanked him in her frank, childish way, for all his goodness, and hoped he would not feel troubled by her going away; she had found a situation with a lady traveling north, and would not return to us. This, she was sure would be better for her, better for us all. There were tears in father's eyes when he laid the letter down, but he said, 'She is right, poor child; it will be better for us all, far better for her.' 'But we must find her,' I cried. 'We don't know how she is situated; she may be working for a living.' 'Toil is better than strife,' he answered sadly. In justice to my stepmother, I confessed that my cruelty, not hers, had driven the child from home. His displeasure was very great, and the punishment imposed was heavier than I had thought his kind nature could devise. It was that I should take no step toward finding and recalling my adopted sister, that I should not even mention her name in his presence. Thus I was cut off from even the hope of hearing from her until my father should choose to speak. Years passed, and I had learned the hard lesson of self-control before he told me that he had traced her to Philadelphia, and found her in a training school for nurses. She was quite happy, and immovable in her determination to make nursing the sick her life work. I went to Philadelphia to beg her forgiveness; but she had gone abroad to remain indefinitely, and I did not hear from her again. That this is she there can be no shadow of doubt; but so entirely is she changed that I did not even suspect the truth until to-night. The eyes did remind me of Lassie, but I had never thought of her except as the thin, plain child grown taller. If my remorse was bitter before, can you think what it is now, that I owe her so much? I am unworthy of her remembrance, but that she does think of me and recall my cruel words, you know, 'No name!' Oh, if the entire devotion of my life can win her confidence and affection, she shall have a name—her right to which no man can question, the name she loved in her childhood."

That night was to me the most solemn of all that solemn season. It comes back to me now, the dimly lighted room, the white bed, the strong spirited girl lying in deathlike stillness waiting for her release, the young man kneeling beside her, almost as still, watching, hoping, praying, for one moment of consciousness in which she may hear his cry of penitence. Surely God heard it, for morning found him still watching and praying, upheld by a new hope that had crept like the dawn into his heart.

She lived. It was as if she had stood, with eager, outstretched arms, upon the river's brink, and then turned slowly back to comfort him.



"JEB" STUART'S LAST BATTLE.

Story of a Heroic Commander's Fight with Custer's Cavalry.

"The most brilliant charge I ever witnessed was made by Custer at the battle of the Yellow Tavern," said an old confederate cavalryman at the recent reunion in Richmond. "It was near the beginning of what historians now call the Wilderness campaign.

"I was with Jeb Stuart, Gen. Fitz Lee's division, Wickham's brigade, and Phil Sheridan's troops were hanging on us like a pack of hungry wolves, nipping us at every turn. We had been marching and fighting pretty steadily more than two weeks with mighty little rest.

"We left Hanover Junction about one o'clock one night and reached Yellow Tavern about ten o'clock the next morning. You know, Sheridan was not one to let grass grow under his feet when there was any fighting to be done and when he was matched against Jeb Stuart it was nip and tuck.

"We hadn't more than halted at the tavern when up comes Sheridan and tries to drive us out. It was a pretty tough struggle, a hand-to-hand fight, and we fell back from the tavern, but held our position on the telegraph road leading to Richmond. I was with the battery on the extreme left wing and it was about two o'clock in the afternoon when orders came for the whole division, excepting the First Virginia, to dismount but hold their positions.

"It did seem good, I can tell you, after so many hours in the saddle to stretch out on the ground and take a smoke; that is, all who had anything to smoke. There was just one pipeful among that whole battery, and the boy who owned it passed it down the line, and each man took his turn puffing at it.

"When it was gone we all began to speculate on what deviltry Sheridan would be up to next, and how Jeb Stuart would head him off. It wasn't long before some fellow wished for a drink of water.

"You know how it is, when one man wishes for water the whole company begins to swear they are dying of thirst. Jack Saunders and I took a bunch of canteens and started over the hill to a spring that he had seen that morning during our scrimmage with the Yanks.

"We Dashed Back to the Battery on the Dead Run."

"I was on my hands and knees over the spring when I heard Saunders' grunt of surprise. He was staring through the trees.

"There, only a few hundred yards away, was a considerable body of cavalry. Making sure that it was our right wing, I wondered to see them mounted and in ranks. Just then the voice of an officer rang out

"'Cavalry! Attention! Draw sabers!'

"The entire line moved forward at a quick walk, and as the officer wheeled his horse I saw his face. It was Custer!

The situation came to Saunders and me like a flash. We threw down the canteens and started back to the battery on a dead run.

"'Trot!' Custer's voice rang out again. The next instant he shouted: 'Charge!'

"With wild cheers his cavalry dashed forward in a sweeping gallop, attacking our entire left wing at the same time. We saw out battery taken, our line broken and our men running like sheep.

"Saunders and I had but one thought, to join our fleeing company. As we reached the telegraph road above the din of the battle I heard Jeb Stuart's voice.

"There he was making a stand with a handful of men around him. Thank God, I had sense enough left to join them.

"It seemed but a moment before Custer's troops were coming back as fast as they had gone forward. They had met the First Virginia. We greeted [illegible] with the rebel yell and our last round.

[illegible] Stuart cheered us on, ah, how he cheered us! I gave them my last shot and was following with my weapon clubbed when I saw a man, who had been dismounted and was running out, turn as he passed our rally and fire his pistol.

"Jeb Stuart swayed in his saddle. It was only for a moment, then his voice rang out cheering his struggling troops.

The enemy rallied just across the road and fired a volley into the little band gathered about Jeb Stuart. His horse sprang forward with a scream of agony and sank down on its knees. As we lifted the general off the young officer who was helping me exclaimed:

"'My God, general, you are wounded! Your clothes are soaked with blood! You must leave the field, sir!'

"'No,' Gen. Stuart answered, 'I will not leave until victory is assured. Get me another horse.'

"When I returned with the horse he was seated with his back against a tree, and when he tried to get up, weakened by loss of blood, he sank back again.

"'Go,' he commanded us. 'I am done for. Fitz Lee needs every man. I order you to go.'

"'We cannot obey that order, general,' the young officer told him, and I'll never forget the look that came over his face as he faced the general. 'We must carry you to a place of safety, however the battle goes.'

"'It must not go against us,' Stuart replied, and the thought seemed to put fresh vigor in his body. 'You must put me on my horse and keep me there. My men must not know that I am wounded.'

"We hurried him on his horse, and mounting our own we held him in his saddle. When the tide of the battle turned, supported between us, he made a last effort to rally his fleeing troops.

"'Go back, men!' he cried. 'Go back, men! Go back and do your duty!'

"We felt him sway in his saddle. The young officer turned our horses' heads to the rear and we carried our fainting general from the field, still holding him upright in the saddle. That was Stuart's last battle and Custer's most brilliant charge."

THE REAL SPY.

Facts Concerning One of the Characters in Cooper's Story.

Next month, in Cooperstown, N. Y., will be held a week's centennial literary celebration in honor of James Fenimore Cooper. To those who hold the author's works in beloved memory the following account of one of his characters may prove interesting. The description is taken from an article by Mr. Miller, entitled "A Spy of the Neutral Ground," published in the New England Magazine.

The chief interest of the "Spy" centers about the figure of Harvey Birch, who plays his part in the book as one of the prominent spies of the revolution.

At the time the novel was published, in 1821, there was much speculation in regard to this hero, and to this day the world at large regards Birch as a creature of pure fiction. The character, however, was taken from the living fact.

Enoch Crosby was born in a Massachusetts village in 1750. Soon after his birth his family removed to Carmel, N. Y., where the boy grew up to be a cordwainer, or shoemaker. He was a pronounced Whig, and when the revolution began, took active service.

Westchester county, New York, was called "The Neutral Ground," as it lay between the opposing armies. It was a region of disorder, ravaged by renegades and refugees who laid waste the land. As Cooper makes one of his characters say, "The law of the Neutral Ground is the law of the strongest." It was to capture a party of such marauders that Paulding, William and Van Wart were lurking when they surprised Andre.

Enoch Crosby, an intelligent, reticent young man of 27, was crossing this tract at one time when he met a man who took him for a Tory, and invited him to his house, where was gathered a company of royalists.

The cordwainer remained until he had possession of a store of Tory secrets. Then he made his way to White Plains, where he told his story to John Jay, who at that time was a member of the committee of safety. This was the beginning of Crosby's career as a spy.

Finding that the young man had special aptitude for the service, Washington advanced him, until he became one of the most important agents in secret work. He led a life of sacrifice and danger, and from the various parts he had to play without explanation, was distrusted by his friends. When the war was over, John Jay asked congress for an appropriation in recognition of Crosby's valuable services. This was granted, but to Jay's astonishment, Crosby refused to accept it.

"It was not for gold I served my country," he said. "The country has need of all its means. I can gain a livelihood in various ways."

Enoch Crosby lived the rest of his days in Carmel, where he became one of the leading men of the town. In 1827 he visited New York city. Cooper's romance of the "Spy" was then filling the theater, and the old patriot went to see the play. He was recognized, introduced to the audience as the real spy, and received a tremendous ovation.

HAS HELPED CHINA UP.

Remarkable Educational Work Which Rev. Cornaby Has Done.

One of the most famous and useful of living missionary pioneers in China is just now on furlough in England. Mr. A. W. Cornaby belongs to the same category of accomplished litterateurs in the missionary field as Dr. Timothy Richard and Dr. Griffith John. These three wonderful experts in the language and literature of the great oriental empire are achieving extraordinary results in transforming the mind of the cultured section of the native community throughout the land. Mr. Cornaby is editing two papers in the native language, says Christian Herald, and is taking a most influential part in the process of introducing western knowledge amongst educated Chinamen.

REV. A. W. CORNABY.

Mr. Cornaby gave the following account of the social system in China:

"The government rests on a purely patriarchal foundation, with the emperor as patriarch or priest-king, as in the case of Job or Melchizedek, the people being his little children, or 'pink babies,' as the Chinese call themselves to this day in relation to the emperor as their head. The mandarins are regarded as the 'deputy parents of the people.' These latter dignitaries are supposed to be above the need of any salary. They are unpaid magistrates. The arrangement seems to have worked well in the ideal days of certain early rulers of China, but its working now is a proverb and a byword of contempt, and it is the great drawback to any real progress or real reform.

"I said that these mandarins were unsalaried," Mr. Cornaby remarked; "but, to be precise, a governor of a province (as large, say, as New York state) gets about $5,000 a year, while a county magistrate gets not more than $100 a year. This being utterly inadequate, the rest is made up from taxes, public moneys, presents from parties at law, and 'squeeze' generally. Huge sums of money are thus in many cases amassed.

"A change must come over the whole mandarin system," continued Mr. Cornaby, "before China can really prosper. It will not matter how far the nation may adopt western methods; there will be no progress worth regarding unless such a radical change is effected. Two things are essential before the world can look on a regenerated China. One is a new system, the other is moral force to work it. This is only another way of saying that the case of China is hopeless without a conquest of the empire by Christian principles. But let me say right here that the signs of the times are marvelously encouraging in the far east. Christianity is steadily honeycombing the whole fabric of Chinese civilization and heathenism. The missionaries are regarded to-day with quite another spirit than that displayed before the Boxer outbreak. A few years ago it was very difficult for a missionary to gain any contact with a viceroy, but for the last three years I have had the privilege of saying 3,000 words to the various 'Princes of the Provinces'—viceroys, governors, treasurers, judges—over 50 of them, seeing and talking with some of them week by week, on subjects connected with Christian civilization, international harmony and the supreme lordship of Jesus Christ."

Gravest Peril to the Church.

John R. Mott says the gravest perils threaten the church, if she neglects to press her present unparalleled advantage, in world-wide conquest, by a great forward movement. In the foreign field missionaries will be broken down by the very success that has come to them in the ingathering and opening of doors. Think of the demands, for example, made upon that pastor at Korea, of whom Dr. Howard Agnew Johnson wrote a couple of weeks ago, telling of his receiving over 1,000 members into his congregation last year! Mr. Mott says: "The sin of unfaithfulness, hypocrisy, the debasing influence of luxurious and selfish living, God's withholding His Spirit through our disobedience to the demands made by our opportunity. All this is ours and much more, if we fail to go forward."

Mission to Jap and Chinese Students.

The World's Student Christian federation proposes to send Dean E. I. Bosworth of Oberlin, to Japan for an evangelistic campaign among Chinese and Japanese students. Mr. Bosworth has rendered excellent service in this country at student gatherings and will represent the progressive scholarship of our country.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1908.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR TO ALL.

A happy new year to you, child of today! May you know more of sunshine than of cloud, and more of glee than of sorrow; may your tumbles and bumps be few, your laughter be frequent and long, your play be unrestrained, your sleep refreshing, your dreams pleasant.

A happy new year to you, bright youth and rosy cheeked maiden of our city and country—all happiness in the ambition, the joy, the friendship, the competitions and the rewards of school life. Success to you in the endeavor whereby the firm, enduring basis of true manhood and of noble womanhood are laid; with what success comes twofold happiness—happiness to others and happiness to yourselves. Go forth gaily and confidently into the new year, O, you who are beautiful in the fresh vigor of your youth!

To you, whose lives are hallowed with the grace of maternity, not one but many, many years of happiness! Live long, wives and mothers of this land, to see the lives you have cherished expand into beauty and usefulness; live long to know and feel the sweet rewards of gratitude, of veneration and of love. Survive those hours of pain, of cruelty, of watching and of sacrifice—live through it all, dear, patient martyrs, to share the peace, the repose, the contentment, the compensations of the future, that surely wait for such as you.

A happy new year, too, to you, grandmothers and grandfathers everywhere! Look out upon all around you and see how passing fair the evening is; and all that is to be heard invites contentment and repose. You hear voices, too, that we do not hear—they have never been quite forgotten, and they speak to you in the sweetly solemn twilight of the morning that followeth the evening, and of the waking that cometh after the folding of the hands to sleep.

Yes, to all the young, the old, the high, the low—a happy New Year, a happiness arising from and tempered with wisdom, faith, hope and charity.

THE BEST REMEDY.

Modern discoverers have already familiarized the public with the fact that crime is a variety of disease. The man who burns his store to get insurance is a pyromaniac; he who steeps himself in Old Rye is a dipsomaniac: he who appropriates other people's property is a kleptomaniac. With the discovery of all these new afflictions and sonorous technical names for them have come, on the one hand, appeals for unusual mercy from the sufferers and a hard search for sure cures by the physicians. Juries and judges, too, have been tempted to waive the usual legal and ethical considerations in dealing with these unfortunates; but of late there has set in a reaction against this practice on account of the alarming increase in the new diseases. The suspicion has arisen that doctors have found no cure for them, and that until they have done so the old-fashioned unscientific treatment must be continued. Again, some jurists are advancing the theory that drugs, lancets and sanatoriums are not necessarily the proper cures for everything called disease. Lord Bramwell, an eminent English judge, expounded this view when in reply to a barrister urging that his client was not a common thief, but suffered from kleptomania, he softly answered: "That is the disease I am here to cure."

The conceptions of the law of a branch of therapeutics has found favor among American jurymen, we rejoice to say. This very week a jury in St. Louis undertook to cure a once prominent Tammany politician of partial amnesia by convicting him of perjury, for which he was thereupon sentenced to two years in prison. The convicted man averred, according to reports, that he had completely forgotten all about a bribe which he was alleged to have offered to members of the House of Delegates, and his attorney sought to show that this was a true pathological case of amnesia by proving that the defendant's cerebral machinery had been thrown slightly out of gear one day as he tumbled downstairs. The action of the jury men cannot be construed as an indicating skepticism; they simply expressed in their verdict the belief that the spread of amnesia can be most effectually checked by quarantining all persons infected with the bacillus amnesia (vulgarly called the Ananias bug).

CHRISTMAS AS A CLASSIC.

Of the recent hot dispute over certain phases of Christmas observances it might perhaps be said that nothing became it so much as its ending. At any rate, nothing about it was more remarkable than the suddenness and completeness with which it vanished. A few days ago the question of a Christian or a Christless Christmas seemed to shadow all the world. Now none is so interested as to write a letter to the editor upon the subject. Such an ending is noteworthy, but it is by no means surprising. We might rather say it was inevitable. There are some things concerning which controversy cannot be maintained.

The anti-Christmas agitation was in fact directed against an essential and integral part of the intellectual and social furniture of civilization. Christmas has become a classic, of universal adoption. It belongs to no one land and to no one faith. It has become all things to all men. Each regards it from his own individual and peculiar point of view, and each celebrates it in his own especial way; but few, indeed, are they who would ignore it altogether.

To some its significance is profoundly spiritual, to others it is dogmatic, to still others it is purely secular. Some regard it from the scientifically historical point of view, and others from that of legend and folk-lore. To some minds it presents pictures of Judean plains and the little City of David, and to others a panorama of Norwegian pine forests and English holly. To many it is supremely a day of domestic joys; to others it is a time of social festivities. There is no day in all the calendar which appeals more strongly to the devout Christian believer, nor any which is regarded with more interest by the purely ethical philosopher. It is one of the greatest ecclesiastical festivals of the Church of Rome, and it is observed and loved with peculiar fervor by Protestant millions to whom its name—Christ's Mass—is anathema.

Each in his own way, and each according to his own conception of its significance and realization of his own needs. But at least all, however, various, may have this in common, that it is a day of "peace on earth to men of gentle will." To that conception of the day, and to an earnest effort so far as in us lies to make it practically realized, no man can offer objection.

HUTTON.

The most sorrowful Christmas that this little hamlet has spent in many years has just been commemorated here.

The grim Reaper Death for the fourth time visited the home of Mrs. Bridget Faherty, this time calling little Edward, aged 14, to his long and eternal home. Sorrows have weighed heavily on this household. One grown daughter followed another only a few years apart to the grave, then after an illness of more than a year came the call for the father. Three months ago Captain Faherty, the oldest son, lost a foot while performing his duties as a conductor on the B. & O. R. R., near Grafton, and now when all the world is joyous in the midst of its holiday festivities, comes without warning the tragic death of the bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked, sunny-dispositioned Edward.

Little Edward was the idol of his mother—the pet of the family—the baby of the household, loved by his neighbors and playmates alike. And the peculiar circumstances connected with his death seem to make it almost unbearable alike for the sorrowing mother and brothers and sisters.

All nature, both animal and vegetable, under our very eyes every day teaches the lessons of the origin, growth, development to full maturity and final dissolution and death of everything finite.

Man is born, followed by the years of infancy, childhood, youth, manhood and when the mission of life is fulfilled in old age comes death and the grave as natural as the falling of the leaf or the setting of the sun. But to be cut off at the very dawn of usefulness and manhood, in the full vigor and growth of all the powers and capabilities which manhood means, is abnormal and unnatural and God's ways are past finding out.

Is there a gleam of light in this night of sorrow? Is there a silver lining to this blackest cloud? Only the lessons of the hour. Such things teach the living with a vividness that seemingly the most careless and indifferent must heed that "the old must die and the young may." Cannot we all stop in our mad rush of feverish activities and weigh the import of that old maxim?

The immortality of the soul! If the greatest evidence of it is that it is not half so wonderful that we should live forever as it is that we live at all; the second greatest proof grows out of just such incidents as this.

The sorrowing mother's burdens would be too great to bear and her heart would break were it not for the faith in the life beyond the grave and the companionship and enjoyment of the loved ones who have gone before.

The Sherwood Triplets.

Mrs. Catherine Sherwood, at the age of 52, gave birth to triplets, who were named, respectively, Franklin, Francis and Frederick. They all became sea captains and all lived to be more than 70 years old. It is related of the brothers that while in Charleston, S. C., they all went into the same barber shop one day to get shaved, one in the early morning, one at noon and the other in the evening, and the barber said that he never saw a man whose beard grew so rapidly as that man's did.—Baltimore Sun.

THAT EXTRA DAY EACH FOUR YEARS

A Brief But Interesting History of the Calendar and Its Changes.

Ladies, 1908 is a leap year.
Thirty days hath September
April, June, and November;
All the rest have thirty-one
Except the second month, alone,
Which has but twenty-eight in fine
'Till Leap Year gives it twenty-nine.

The history of leap year is interesting, not only to those of the gentler sex who are matrimonially inclined, but also to the student, the scientist. As a year is the time of the earth's revolution around the sun, it should contain 365 days and a fraction of a day.

The ancients, having great respect for the moon, wanted the year to be subdivided into parts corresponding with her revolution around the earth. The difficulties of adjusting the moon's revolutions, or months, so as to be together equal to the earth's revolutions round the sun gave rise to February itself, and to many of the changes which the month has undergone before it stood with its present number of days.

Romulus' division of the year is the first European one known, and the one upon which our own division is based. He had ten months, whose total length was 304 days. How he patched up the year with the odd days so as to make it anything like correct is not known. To remedy his mistake, which left sixty-one days not accounted for, Numa Pompilius, second king of Rome, added two months, January and February.

January, named after Janus, the god who presided over the beginning of all things, was made the first month of the year. February, in Latin means to expiate. In this month the expiatory sacrifices were performed, and as the sins of the year were, very naturally atoned for after they were committed February was made the last of the months. Two hundred years after Numa Pompilius, February was brought by the Decemvirs, for reasons best known to themselves, to its present position.

Although two new months had been added, namely, January and February, the year was not long enough yet. Numa made his months to correspond to the revolutions of the moon, which made 354 days, of eleven days short of the earth's annual journey around the sun. When the Romans found one month had to be changed, they hit upon February, for no apparant good reason, unless it being the month of the dead. The clumsy alternation was made by naming a month which appeared on alternate years.

Several other clumsy corrections were made until the days and months came out pretty even. Things did not work very well, however, under this system, for politics appeared. The calendar was in charge of the pontiffs, and if they wanted to keep a friend in office they could lengthen the extra month, or of they wanted to hold elections before their enemies were ready they could curtail the month and catch their opponents napping. There is nothing on record to indicate that the pontiffs ever took advantage of their prerogatives in this respect.

After a while matters became so badly mixed that in Julius Caesar's time the winter months were in autumn and the autumn months in the summer, and so on. Caesar took the bull by the horns and introduced two months of his own between November and December. This gave the Romans a year of 445 days. This particular year, which was B. C. 46, is known to history as "The Year of Confusion." This wonderful year canceled all previous errors, and when the question of how to make the succeeding years of equal length, and to correspond to the annual revolution of the earth around the sun, and Caesar's attempts at its solution brought about the introduction of leap year. Caesar did not consider the moon in his calculations, but made months of thirty and thirty-one days alternately, except February, which he gave twenty-nine days in ordinary years and thirty every fourth year.

Because of his straightening out the difficulties of the calendar, and because he calculated to within a fraction of a day in each year, Caesar was worthy of a lasting memorial. Therefore the name of the month Quintilis was changed to Julius.

Augustus Caesar, the successor of Julius, after some victories by his armies, had a month named for him, too. It so happened, however, that the month named for Augustus had only thirty days, where as that named for Julius had thirty-one. Augustus did not like this, so he had an extra day added to August. Thereafter February had twenty-eight days in ordinary years, and twenty-nine in leap year.

Since, the time of the Caesars, however, it has been found necessay to reduce the number of leap years. If the dictionary were consulted for the mean of leap year it would probably read "every fourth year." That answer, though it would would have done well in Caesar's time, is not correct now, because the arrangements which had then been arranged at made the year of proper length except only a fraction of an hour. The year was on the average, 365¼ days long, whereas the sun's revolutions is eleven minutes and ten seconds less than that. This slight error might have been corrected at once by a reduction of the number of leap years. But the error was allowed to grow, so that by A. D. 1582, the year in which it was corrected, it amounted to ten days. In that year Pope Gregory decreed that the 5th day of October be the 15th, thus canceling the error of the past.

The correction was not adopted by all the countries at once, but gave rise to what is known as the new style in those countries which did adopt it. To this day Russia holds to the old style, and in some places in Great Britain the terms are regulated by the old style. Having correctad the error of the past, Pope Gregory endeavored to prevent its recurrence in the future.

The error was equivalent to an excess of about three day in four centuries, so he decreed that of the last years of the century only those which are divisible by 400 are leap years. So that, though 1600, a multiple of 400, was a leap year, 1700, 1800 and 1900 were not leap years.

The year is now exactly as it was after Gregory had corrected it. Even after this correction, however, there remains a slight error. The mistake is so exceedingly small that it will amount to only a day in 3900 years. The error is one of excess, so it is proposed to make the year A. D. 2000, otherwise a leap year, a common year. After that the length of the year will so exactly correspond to the earth's revolutions around the sun that they will not differ more than a day in 1,000 centuries.—Randolph De Zapp in Washington Herald.

HOYES.

The Christmas entertainment held here on Christmas night was a decided success, and was well enjoyed by a large and appreciative audience. Music was the special feature of the program. This was so well rendered as to be the subject of warm congratulations received by the committee on music and its faithful choir. The committee on decorations and finance also labored faithfully, and carried their work to a successful termination. Pine and Christmas trimmings adorned the church, and added greatly to the effect of the exercises. The sweet tooth of every child and Sunday school pupil present was well filled with the treat given. After all was over, a flash light picture was taken of the choir and Sunday school leaders arranged among the beautiful decorations.

Rev. A. L. Donachy of Friendsville, preached a very able sermon in the M. E. church at this place Sunday last.

The repairs on our church here have greatly improved the appearance of the building. The official board estimates that these improvements, when completed, will amount to about seven hundred dollars.

Rev. A. S. Wolfe, our pastor, is doing a good work among the people here, and receives the hearty applause of all.

Mrs. Hamilton Friend has been sick for a few days, but, we are glad to note, she is now somewhat better.

F. R. DeWitt and two little sons are visiting friends over in Pennsylvania at this writing.

Henry Casteel and wife, of Oakland, spent Christmas with the latter's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. E. Bishoff.

Miss Eva Welch is spending her vacation with friends in Grantsville.

Messrs. H. P. Miller and Louis Diefenbach, of Grantsville, spent a day or so in this community recently.

Alvin Lowdermilk spent Christmas at his home here, returning Friday to his work at Greensburg, Pa., accompanied by his brother Burns, who will remain there with him for a few days.

Geo. E. Bishoff attended a School Board meeting at Oakland last week and his nephew Hobert Bishoff returned home with him after spending a few days with his aunt, Mrs. H. M. Casteel.

Miss Bertha Custer goes to Oakland for Christmas week, to visit her sister, Mrs. Wm. Casteel.

Misses Dessie and Blanche Callis, are home for the holidays. The former is a teacher at Kearney, and the latter has been at Mt. Lake Park for some months.

Miss Ethel Welch is home for vacation from Western Maryland College.

Wm. E. Bishop of Kitzmillerville, spent the holiday week with his parents here.

Urner Beeghly and sister Grace, of Accident spent Sunday with friends in this community.

C. A. Guthrie, of Accident, was here on business Monday.

Miss Elizabeth Welch, a teacher of Friendsville, was home for a day or two last week.

W. A. Smith was at Confluence, Pa., on business recently.

Treasurer H. R. DeWitt, of Oakland was in our village for Christmas.

A jolly surprise party was given at the home of J. M. Lowdermilk Thursday evening in honor of the boys, who are home on a vacation. The party numbered twenty-five, and understood the art of having a good sociable time, which all enjoyed on this occasion.

Now, when vacation days are ended, may we all return to our work with bright hopes for the future as well as pleasant reflections on the past, and a Happy New Year to all.

COAL TAKEN FROM ABANDONED MINE.

John Brophy's Novel and Profitable Venture in Coal Reclamation.

Under a Pittsburg date line, the New York Herald of yesterday publishes a dispatch dealing with the reclamation of abandoned coal mines in the Georges Creek region and the conspicuous service rendered in this particular by Mr. John Brophy as an expert miner and engineer:

"Although there are thousands of acres of coal lands throughout the United States that are undeveloped and never sullied by the stroke of a pick, coal mines long ago abandoned as being worked out are being reclaimed in certain sections of the country. Probably the most conspicuous example of reclaiming old mines, removing the coal and gutting the mountain side is in the Georges Creek region, near Cumberland, Md.

"History shows that the first bituminous coal mined in the United States was found near Frostburg, Md. Old records show that as early as the time of George Washington some coal was removed from the hills in this notable region. Mining on a large scale was carried on at this place as many as sixty years ago, big wagons carrying the coal to the markets. Fifty years ago some of the coal mines were abandoned, supposedly being worked out. In reality thousands of tons of good coal remained, but the crude methods adopted in those days in removing the coal were not sufficient to rob the mountains of the black diamonds and today they are being reclaimed.

"One of the coal companies that has been eminently successful in this work is the Piedmont and Georges Creek Coal Company, of which John Brophy, an expert miner and engineer, is the president and active head. Six or seven years ago this company leased old workings from the Consolidation Coal Company, paying so much a ton on coal removed. Wise old heads scoffed at the idea that coal could be removed in paying quantities from mines which had been abondoned for more than fifty years and were filled with fallen slate and rock; whose rooms and headings were the habitation of bats, while great pools of water filled the air courses, headings and low places until the mines resembled a series of dumps.

"Brophy, both an engineer and coal miner, however, started to make a survey of the property, with the result that at certain places an acre or two of good coal was found untouched. At other places headings had fallen in when the operations were on and other headings were driven around the obstruction. This was about the only method employed by coal miners fifty years ago, and great blocks of coal of considerable value were found to be untouched.

"No one who has never experienced anything of the kind knows what obstacles had to be overcome in making the surveys. The engineers who made the maps of the abandoned mines had to crawl many miles on their knees, level the transit head on the top of a pile of slate, take the magnetic direction and chain the distance. The engineers penetrated many miles into the old workings and found coal to exist in abundance never touched by the invaders of a half century ago. After the map had been made projections were mapped out on the plot and the mines were again opened.

"After clearing out the main heading it was turned so that it would be driven straight across the rooms, therefore making it possible to remove just as much coal as debris had to be removed. These headings and butt headings were thus driven clear to the property lines. Then the work was started back. Headings were driven at right angles across the blocks of solid coal, timbering was brought into play and pillars were drawn according to the modern way of mining.

"The work is still continuing and the people who dared undertake the job are growing rich. This is due to the fine quality of coal, the nearness to tidewater, with a differential of ten cents a ton on freight rates, and the scarcity of any coal so near to the Atlantic seaboard. The coal which is now being removed is the closest to the Baltimore market of any coal in the United States."

School Entertainment.

The teachers and pupils of the Accident school decided to make an effort to secure a school library, accordingly a splendid program was arranged and duly announced.

Rev. Zimmerman and Prof. Grupe kindly consented to furnish music for the occasion. And we do not hesitate to say that it was the best music ever rendered in the schoel here. Miss Clara Meitz proved herself a real expert at the piano, and it is the common verdict of the largest and most respectable audience ever known in the public school building in this place, that Rev. Zimmerman is a cultured musician and performs at the piano with a master hand.

The Accident Glee Club greatly delighted the audience.

Vocal solos rendered by Misses Martha Meitz and Bernadette Mattingly were much enjoyed. Nature has bestowed upon these young ladies very sweet musical voices. We hope to have them sing again.

The idea of establishing a school library at Accident as the common property of the parents and the children of the village and community, to be used by them as a constant revenue of knowledge, at once met with general approval, and the good people responded promptly and liberally Dec. 20, 1907, resulting in a splendid collection and the library will be purchased.

We take this opportunity to thank all who took part in this good work, and trust it may be as bread cast upon the waters to be seen after many days!

J. C. BEAHM.

There are times in the work of a newspaper man when he must be controlled by his sympathies for the innocent ones in the publication of news. This paper bows to the inevitable in such cases and is willing to accept the criticism of some if good is accomplished and aching hearts are saved further pain.

Ex-Senator U. G. The children rendered a short program of singing and recitations and Miss Anna Manges added to their enjoyment by reading a number of appropriate selections. Every little country village has an ambition to become a trade center and a boom city, with no special natural features or geographical advantages. Under such conditions what is most needed is some enterprise on the part of its local capitalists. They must make the first advance in the uncertain field of development. They must capitalize small factories and see that they are kept employed. When the local business is finally developed and proves to the world that they are successful, then outside enterprises will be sure to step in and enjoy your prosperity with you. Just like a fellow who finds a favorite fishing hole and catches fish, and all the other fishermen who see that he is catching will drop their hooks right by the side of the lucky fisherman. The business men of any town should stop talking and hoping for others to do something for the town. They should get together themselves and prove to the world that they have a money making town. No outsider will want to fish in our swimming hole until we prove that they can catch fish.

A tickling cough, from any cause, is quickly stopped by Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure. And it is so thoroughly harmless and safe, that Dr. Shoop tells mothers everywhere to give it without hesitation even to very young babes. The wholesome green leaves and tender stems of a lung-healing mountainous shrub, furnish the curative properties to Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure. It calms the cough, and heals the sore and sensitive bronchial membranes, no chloroform, nothing harsh used to injure or suppress. Simply a resinous plant extract, that helps to heal aching lungs. The Spaniards call this shrub which the Doctor uses, "The Sacred Herb." Always demand Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure.

Don't grumble. The most unfortunate class of people living upon this green earth are the grumblers. They rob home of its joys, society of its dues, and themselves of the best things of life. From the days the children of Israel "grumbled" and were sent on their tedious wanderings "for forty years in the wilderness,', up to the present hour the world has been full of grumblers. It is 'too hot" or "too cold," "too wet" or "dry." People in reasonable circumstances have visions of the poor house, while the rich grumble that they can't get rich faster.

A plan for drawing trade to a town that has been successfully worked at several points might be adopted to advantage in this city. The plan is as follows: An agreement was reached between all the merchants whereby they offered special sales on certain days, each merchant selecting some special line of goods upon which he made a lower price than usual Thus one dry goods house would sell gloves at a special price, while another would offer bargains in dress goods. One hardware merchant would reduce the price on skates. Every line of business was represented and care was taken that no conflicts occurred. Prizes were then offered to the farmer bringing in the best load of grain or the handsomest baby and the bargain day was extensively advertised in the surrounding country, the names of the merchants and their special sales being in all cases stated. The farmers responded in a most gratifying manner and the merchants were well pleased with the plan. The idea has already been carried out in several cities.

INDIAN CUSTOMS IN MONTANA.

Mr. Bernard Gonder Describes Christmas As It Is Observed Among the Aboringinals.

To the Editor of The Republican:

DEAR SIR: Owing to the heavy decrease in traffic the Northern Pacific Railway has cut out a considerable number of operators and there being one taken off at Thompson Falls, it so happened that it was I who had to suffer and be moved. This place which, although not quite so prettily located as Thompson, yet it is much larger, it having a population of about a thousand inhabitants. Plains is the largest town in Sanders county, abont 25 miles east of Thompson Falls, situated in the center of a large plain of about 10 or 12 miles in diameter, through which runs the beautiful Clark's Fork of the Columbia River. On this plain one can see many large farms, which produces thousands of bushels of wheat yearly, also a lot of live stock.

Plains' main support comes from the farms in the vicinity and the Flathead Indians, whose reservation is but four miles north.

The Indians from this reservation buy all of their supplies here. Since I have been in Plains I have noticed quite a number of Indians on the streets. They all dress in their native garments but do not paint their faces or wear feathers in their hair. Most of the Indian men wear their hair long and let it hang down their backs. They also wear a broad brim cowboy's hat.

As it is getting around Christmas time I will try and tell you what this means to them.

I understand that many of the Indians that keep up their tribal existence are Christians. To them, as to the white people, Christmas is an important anniversary, but they celebrate it in their own way. This way would not be approved by certain Christian denominations of white people because it includes as the chief feature a dance.

The southwestern Indian tribes have a special fondness for all sorts of ceremonial dances. Every dance has a deep significance to them. When they assemble for their Christmas observance they begin by praying for rain and bountiful crops, then follows the dance. This is the only dance in which the women are permitted to take part. The men and women form in opposite lines and start up a song, their bodies swaying in rhythm. Then they break up into groups and dance towards each other with a hippity-hop step holding their bodies rigid. The next movement is to form a circle and dance around a Christmas tree hung with articles which are gifts of Santa Claus to good Indians. The Indians kneel and pray in front of an altar during the performance.

When Santa Claus visits the Indian papoose on the plains he does not find stockings in which to deposit his present. As a rule the little Indians in the tepee does not wear stockings, for the first year or two at any rate. The baby is strapped to a board, its body wrapped in warm skins and only its head sticking out so that it can cry without being cramped for space. Frequently the papoose takes its nap in an upright position, its mother leaning the baby board against the tepee pole. On Christmas eve Santa Claus steals into the tepee and lays beside the sleeping papoose its Christmas presents. These are not so numerous or so costly as the white baby's presents, but to the little bronze baby they are just as good. Nearly always the Indian baby gets things of bright colors. Indians, big and little, are particularly fond of garish hues. A red necktie, a blue ribbon, a yellow scarf or a stick of striped candy may be the selection of Santa Claus, but a string of shells or beads, the tooth of an elk or the claw of a bear is most likely to be the papoose's present. When the papoose wakes up and find its gifts it is just as happy as the richest white child in the land.

Will close for this time by wishing a merry Christmas and a happy and a successful new year for you and your paper.

BERNARD GONDER.

Prof. Claude E. Vincent May Direct The Band and Orchestra at Mt. Lake Park.

Prof. Claude E. Vincent is in receipt of a letter today offering him the directorship of the Chautauqua band and orchestra at Mountain Lake Park next summer.

The letter is from Johann M. Blose, an eminent musician of Washington, Pa., who has a conservatory of music there, and who is also connected with some of the leading musical societies of the country.

This is a very flattering testimonial of Prof. Vincent's musical ability, as Prof. Blose is a critical judge and musical director of the Chautauqua, where Prof. Vincent has played for the past two seasons. Prof. Vincent has not yet decided whether he will accept the offer or not but in all probability he will.—Grafton Sentinel.

COMES FROM A FAMOUS DISTRICT.

Congressman George C. Sturgiss, of Morgantown, Spends Sunday In Pittsburg, Pa.

The Pittsburg Gazette Times of Monday speaks of Congressman Sturgiss as follows:

"The Hon. George C. Sturgiss, of Morgantown, W. Va., representing the Second congressional district, and who is now serving his first term in the lower house, was in Pittsburg yesterday at the Monongahela house. Mr. Sturgiss is now representing one of the most notable districts in the United States. The Second district is primarily noted for giving to the country the late William L. Wilson, author of the celebrated tariff bill, and afterwards president of Washington & Lee university. Alston G. Dayton, present federal judge, who occasionally sits in Pittsburg, succeeded Wilson, and served four terms. He was afterwards appointed by President Roosevelt to succeed Judge Jackson, who, in turn, was the last judge on the federal bench to be appointed by Abraham Lincoln. Judge Jackson recently died in Washington, D. C. Colonel "Tom" Davis, of Keyser, a Democrat, was elected to succeed Dayton. He tired of the congressional life after one term, and Sturgiss was elected to succeed him, after the Democrats made but little fight. Sturgiss was elected to the lower house a year ago and had his first glimpse of that body on the convening on congress. He is president of the West Virginia state board of trade, a philanthropist, a millionaire, and one of the able men of the state. He practices law as a side line."

Jonas Bittinger and wife are making preparations to start in a few days for an extended visit to Braddock, Pittsburg and other cities.

Albert Brenneman and family drove over to Mechanicsburg, Pa., last Sunday to spend the holidays with relatives and friends.

Simon Maust and Miss Lizzie Otto, of Springs, Pa., were calling on friends here last Sunday.

THE REPUBLICAN and all its readers have our best wishes for a happy and prosperous New Year.

Occasionally one will hear the remark, "I wish I was out of this town," and then one feels like saying. "I wish you were," for a man who stands on the street corners chewing and spitting, telling obscene stories, cursing the town, finding fault with his grand mother because she was a woman, claiming that the merchants are a lot of thieves, that the lawyers and newspaper men would skin a man to a finish, and a whole lot more, is a nuisance and an abomination. Any town pestered with one or more such worthies would be justified in exercising cowhide authority on the bosom of their pants. No one is obliged to live where he is not suited. It one hasn't an encouraging word for the business enterprise and institutions of his town, he should shut up and "go 'way back and sit down." If things don't suit you, move to where they will. A growler and sorehead in a town is an enterprise killer every time. It would pay a town to donate him $5 and tell him to move.

COME IN AND GET ACQUAINTED

The Luck of Unlucky Peters.

By ALICE LOUISE LEE.

Copyright, 1907, by Alice Louise Lee.

MISS LOVILLA SCANLON sat in the doorway of her nephew's log shack in Wood river canyon humming happily as she made "tattin'." "Abigail and Salina make beautiful battenberg work," she was wont to say cheerily, "but tattin' is the only fancy work I can do, and I'm going to make the best of it."

This was Miss Lovilla's philosophy of life—"to make the best of things," despite the repressive atmosphere enveloping the two younger sisters with whom she had "stayed" during a large portion of her life. She was born and brought up—as far as forty years—in New England, where birth statistics prove that there are not enough men to go around. This fact may have accounted for the "Miss" which lingered before her name, because with her sunny eyes and girlish mouth she was a comely woman, as the men of Camp Kirwin agreed and as twelve sprawling red lines on the logs opposite her place at table indicated.

"Such a boy as that Alfred is!" she thought, half amused and half vexed as her nephew mischievously chalked in line after line, more or less crooked, to represent the characters of her numerous suitors. "There's only one man in camp that'll get a straight mark." Alfred remarked as he drew the twelfth, "and if I have to make one for him," significantly, "I hope it'll be the last."

He referred to the owner of a solitary cabin on Spar just above timber line. Miss Lovilla, pausing now in her tattin' making, raised her eyes to it speculatively. The cabin was evidently deserted. The stovepipe, protruding through the roof, had emitted no smoke for several days. Miss Lovilla knew because she had glanced in its direction far oftener than she cared to admit. "I wonder where he is," she thought, scanning the mountain slopes behind her. Suddenly she turned and bent over her work while a faint pink crept into her cheeks.

On the trail across Brown rode a man, followed by a pack horse. It was Peters the Unlucky, christened Robert some forty odd years before and named Unlucky for various legitimate reasons; he had made more good "finds" than any other man this side the divide and held the fewest. It was he who discovered the rich leads of Dunbar, only to have his claims jumped by Dutch Jo. He had started Sniffle, Idaho, to work out his assessments owing to the fact there seemed to be no one else to care for Shandy Long when he was stabbed in the saloon on the Meadows.

Alfred expounded the situation concerning Unlucky to his aunt in his usual lucid manner shortly after her arrival. "Unlucky probably won't die overcumbered with gold, but he'll die on the square, you bet!" And his aunt had responded sympathetically, "He's just making the best of things, ain't he?"

Across the pommel of his saddle he bore an immense bouquet of gay mountain flowers which he intended for Miss Lovilla, but which he did not offer directly, for Unlucky numbered self consciousness among his misfortunes. He left his horses on the trail and came to the doorstone, hat in hand. "Good morning, Miss Scanlon," he said, raising his eyes in a quick flash to hers—so quick that he did not see the unusual flush in her cheeks.

"SAY! MARRY ME? MR. PRINZ" HE FINALLY BURST OUT.

"Good morning, Mr. Peters," she returned, conscientiously repressing the cordiality she felt.

Hesitatingly the man sat down and nursed his bouquet on his knee. He wanted to tell Miss Lovilla all about his new claims over on Meadow creek, but what he actually said was, "Fair day today."

Miss Lovilla, longing to hear all that he wished to tell, answered staidly, "Yes, fair, but warmish."

Then a silence fell. Unlucky stared fixedly at the stems he was twisting, but the woman made quick side observations as she plied her shuttle. His was a face that any woman might view with satisfaction, not handsome, but clear cut, with kind, steady eyes and strong white teeth which came together evenly behind straight firm lips.

Presently he glanced up at the mouth of a tunnel on the mountain behind them. "Has Alf struck good ore yet?" he asked.

"He tells me he's taking out pretty fair stone; but, good gracious"—Miss Lovilla laid her shuttle in her lap and spoke with pleasing briskness—"the stuff in it that shines like gold ain't gold at all, just copper, he says, and I don't believe it's worth digging for; but, then, he's making the best of it, I guess."

Unlucky looked at her with a smile to which his face was almost a stranger. Then it died away into an expression of thoughtfulness. "Sometimes, Miss Scanlon, I wonder if this sort of life is best for any of us fellows. There's your nephew." The man hesitated and gazed wistfully across the canyon at his own little shack. "He might better be trailin' a good home somewhere back east—and a wife"—Unlucky came to an abrupt stop and twisted the stems of the flowers, but there was an expression in his eyes that deepened the pink in Miss Lovilla's cheeks and caused her to glance beyond him.

Immediately her attention was arrested by a man's head among the willows across the river. The head wore a brown hat and was moving toward the upper ford. She frowned as she recognized Dutch Jo, who kept a saloon on the Meadows. Unlucky's glance also followed the progress of the brown hat, and when its wearer had forded the stream and turned toward them he arose, quietly laid the flowers on the stone and, with a brief "Good day, Miss Scanlon," departed.

Miss Lovilla glued her eyes on her work, apparently oblivious of the presence of the horseman until he had dismounted some distance away, his broncho refusing to approach so unaccustomed an object as a woman, and greeted her with a "Gut day, Mees Scanlon."

Then she arose and laid her work in her chair. "Good morning, Mr. Sahler. You want to see my nephew, I presume." Her voice savored only of business.

"Nein." Dutch Jo covered her with a covetous albeit respectful eye and abstractedly fingered the handle of his six shooter, which he could manage with more dexterity than he could the English language. "Say! Marry mit me, hein?" he finally burst out.

Instinctively Miss Lovilla shrank back and glanced at the flowers. "Oh, no," she cried hurriedly. "I couldn't—possibly."

The man wasted no further speech, but, stepping deliberately on the bouquet, ground it beneath his heel, mounted his horse and rode off, leaving an indignant woman nursing the crumpled blossoms. The clock striking 11 aroused her to a sense of her household duties, and when her nephew entered the lean-to kitchen she was her busy, serene self again.

"I declare, Aunt Lo," he exclaimed merrily, "you are getting nicer every day. I don't wonder the boys all want to marry you."

A half bashful smile touched his aunt's lips. "Pshaw, Alf. It's because I'm the only woman here. Now, if Abigail and Salina weren't married and were here you'd see"—

Alfred removed the towel from his face and interrupted solemnly. "Aunt Lo, when Gabriel comes down with his trumpet I expect to hear you tell him that if there happens to be a seat left after Abigail and Salina have been ushered to the front pew, why, you'll take it, please, and make the best of it."

"Alf!" Miss Lovilla remonstrated. Nevertheless she looked pleased. Praise had not come her way back in New England.

"And I'm lookin' to Gabe to say," Alfred continued, "that he's reserved a seat for the best and sweetest and most unselfish little woman on earth. Now, Aunt Lo, don't be shocked, but tell me what poor unfortunate struck the matrimonial trail today. You looked guilty when I came in. Whose horse was it I saw at the door?"

"That—that Dutchman's from the Meadows," returned Miss Lovilla in a tone savoring of the snap of a whip.

Alfred threw his head back and roared. "Dutch Jo!" Still laughing, he entered the living room, raising his voice as he continued. "By Jove! He's the thirteenth too. That's unlucky for himself or some one else. His mark can't be too crooked either, for if there's a man this side of Meeteetse without a conscience"—

The closing kitchen door shut out the rest of the sentence.

Sniffle was throwing a long shadow eastward that afternoon before Miss Lovilla sat again in the doorway with her tattin' and greeted the stray prospectors as they struck the trail across Brown. It was Kilbraid of Meeteetse that finally brought a look of alarm to her eyes and sent her gaze searchingly down the canyon.

"Dutch Jo come up behind me fightin' drunk," said Kilbraid, laughing, "swearin' like a pirate and hittin' out with his quirt at every flower he passed. It's a right good plan to be on Jo's best side such times as this."

Miss Lovilla glanced behind her at the ominously crooked thirteenth line and shivered when her informant had ridden on. Then she laid her tattin' aside and watched for the appearance of a brown hat on the canyon trail. Simultaneously with its appearance a figure emerged from the shack on the side of Spar and disappeared among the pines beneath the branches of which the rail zigzagged down to Bear creek and met the canyon trail.

"You'll be sorry some day you ever left us for Wyoming," Abigail had remarked with a pious droop at the corners of her mouth as she bade the eldest sister goodby, and the memory of that cheerful parting flashed into Miss Lovilla's mind now as she arose and called, "Alfred, Alfred!" If any harm should come to Unlucky through her, "I shall just have to make the best of it alone," she cried aloud as the only reply to her call was a dull boom of a blast in the tunnel above.

Across the footbridge and through the willows she hurried, her breath coming faster and faster as she began the ascent to Bear creek. Farther up the trail sounded Unlucky's whistle, while down among the willows echoed the sharp click of a horse's hoofs.

"If I'm only in time to warn him!" she whispered, but she was not. Nearer and nearer came the sound of the horse's hoofs. Dutch Jo, fighting drunk, was gaining on her. The next turn in the trail would bring him into view.

"NO, I'M NOT HURT."

"I've got to stop him," gasped Miss Lovilla, trembling, but resolute.

Now, whatever Dutch Jo's original expectations had been in coming up to camp armed and whisky brave, he certainly did not expect to be held up by any such noushootable object as a woman. Neither did his horse, which promptly snorted and backed, skirts having greater terrors for it than spurs.

"Shtand out of the way!" vociferated Dutch Jo, listening to the whistle.

"I shan't do any such a thing!" retorted Miss Lovilla, occupying the middle of the trail and gathering up her apron through force of habit.

Dutch Jo drove the spurs deeper and menaced the opposition with his quirt. "Will you no shtand out of my way, hein?" he urged, his face purpling with anger.

"No, I won't," declared Miss Lovilla. The approaching whistle rendered her desperate. She advanced precipitately into the pony's face, waving her apron frantically. "Shoo!" she cried. "Go back with you!"

That settled the matter. Unceremoniously the broncho showed a pair of iron shod heels to the up trail and departed Meadowward, with the bit in his teeth, leaving Miss Lovilla "all tremble."

"Salina always said I was a bigger baby than either of hers," she quavered and proceeded to demonstrate the fact by plumping herself down on the nearest log and weeping into the ample folds of her apron.

Here an instant later Unlucky stood as helpless before her tears as Dutch Jo had been before her unexpected onslaught. Miss Scanlon, what's the matter?" he implored.

"I don't know," came in faltering untruthfulness from behind the apron.

This weeping over, she knew not what was the most bewildering proposition Unlucky had ever met with. "Has anything—have you—hurt yourself?" he asked, bending over and laying a hesitating hand on the apron.

"No, I'm not hurt." Miss Lovilla was glad she was not obliged to lie this time.

Unlucky's hand fell from the apron. "Why," he began perplexedly, "it can't be you are crying just to—to pass away the time."

Then Miss Lovilla's tears gave way suddenly to smiles. She removed the apron and looked up at Unlucky standing straight and tall and honest before her. It was good to see him there. "I'm so glad," she burst out between tears and laughter, "that you are alive."

It was a strange speech. Dutch Jo a mile down the canyon would have understood it, but not Unlucky. To him it meant something which filled him with the joys of a courage he had never expected would be his, and before Miss Lovilla could protest—had she been so inclined—he had taken her comely face between his hands and kissed it.

The sun had set, and Alfred was wondering what had become of his aunt, when she appeared, followed by Unlucky. There was an air about them both which arrested Alfred's attention before Unlucky spoke.

"Alf," he began, "I'm in luck. I've just staked the richest gold find in Wyoming, and no one's goin' to jump my claim either."

Alfred glanced at Miss Lovilla's smiling face, and a pleased grin began at his bearded lips and was lost in his dancing eyes. Without a word he crossed the living room and with one stroke of the red chalk drew the fourteenth and last line long and straight.

NOTES FROM MEADOWBROOK FARM

By William Pitt

Get rid of the scrubs.

Don't buy an article because it is cheap.

The fall is a good time to tile out the orchard or garden.

Trying, not sighing, is what conquers the perplexing farm task.

In laying in the fodder arrange it so that it can be handled with the least possible labor.

It's the stirred soil which in dry weather retains the moisture for the growing of the crops.

These cool nights when the horse comes in sweaty be careful to rub him off and blanket until dry.

Generally speaking, the cow which your neighbor is so anxious to sell is just the cow you cannot afford to buy.

Count the sheep often. How can you know what is going on in the flock unless you look it over occasionally?

Remember this next time you are sowing turnip seed. Mix with sand about a pound of seed to a peck of sand, and then distribute by hand.

The hen-eating hog should be looked after. Such propensity is the outgrowth of a deficient ration. Experiment until you have supplied the feed he lacks.

A clean, dry bed is as much appreciated by piggy as by you. Dampness and filth are not conducive to sound and refreshing slumber any more to beast than to man.

Get the crops under cover. Farm buildings may be expensive, but they pay, for damage done to crops not properly housed would soon pay for the necessary buildings.

For colic in horses try aloes, two drams, and spirits of turpentine, six ounces. Dissolve aloes in three quarts of warm water, stir in turpentine and give as drench.

The fair which gives the best prizes to the horses of the speed track, and treats as a side issue the best of the hogs and sheep and cattle, is the kind of an agricultural show which the farmer can profitably stay away from.

Don't let the crowding of the work rob you of the time to read your farm paper and Meadowbrook Farm Notes. The editor likes to visit with the farmer during the busy season as well as during the dull, in fact, a little better for it is then that he is able to be of more practical service to the farmer than at any other time. It is the hint in season that is worth more than an encyclopedia of knowledge at a time when it cannot be used. Keep read up.

The new barn of the Massachusetts Agricultural college has been pronounced by government experts as the best in the country from a sanitary point of view. It is light and well ventilated, and is equipped with apparatus for sterilizing milk. Although it cost $37,000, farmers who have not that amount of money to put into a barn can keep their cow stables light and clean, and thereby improve the quality of the milk and prevent disease.

Investigations by experiment stations have proved that hogs easily contract tuberculosis by eating the manure of cows which are infected. If the cattle show signs of the disease, the hogs should be separated from them at once. There is not so much danger in allowing the hogs to run behind beef cattle as behind dairy cattle. The former are young and have not at the time they are fed become badly infected. Dairy cattle are older and the disease has had time to get a firmer hold.

We have never tried it, but a dairyman who has, says that a calf that has never sucked will drink from the pail from the word go. He fixes things so that the calf is kept from its dam after calving, and a few hours after he milks about three quarts in a pail and puts it under the calf's nose so as to touch, and says that the calf will at once begin to drink. Our plan has been to take the calf away on the second day and have found it no difficult task to bring the calf to drink from the pail by inserting two fingers in the calf's mouth and bringing her nose into the milk. As she begins to suck gradually withdraw the fingers and with a few times trying your calf will drink without further trouble.

The leaf is the lung of the tree.

Get after the tent caterpillars upon the trees.

The cows appreciate a share of the sweet apples and the pumpkins. Don't forget them.

Turnips make a good crop to add humus to the soil and are also good for feed to the stock.

There is no profit in a sick horse. For this reason take every precaution against such condition.

It takes rugged, vigorous thinking and actions in harmony with the thoughts to make farming pay.

Where is the profit if you winter the old ewe and let her die in the spring. Better fit her for killing this fall.

The value of the horse is largely dependent on his gait. For this reason see that the colt is taught to walk fast.

Think how you feel about it yourself: You would not sell your best cow, neither should you expect the other fellow would do so.

Turnips are a questionable feed for the cows as the flavor is apt to be imparted to the milk. They are good feed for the other stock, however. Feed them.

Have the children gather the fallen limbs, chips, etc., lying around and put them under shelter before the fall rains come. They make fine kindling and the place will look better with the rubbish cleared up.

In moving the plow to the field use a plow skid—it is easy to make one from a curved sapling—and make the task an easy one as well as avoiding the risk of breading the mold board or straining the shares.

The time to plow is when the soil is just moist enough to crumble nicely. If the land is plowed then it will be found that the work can be done with less labor than at any other time.

There is yet a great host of farmers who are not convinced of the profitableness of the cream separator. Well, every man must decide for himself, but it is certain that those who have used the separator never want to go back to the old methods of cream separation.

If you are planning the planting of trees along the roadside, and this is a splendid thing to do, remember that the trees with high growing trunks are best. Such trees do not have low hanging branches to interfere with passing teams, and it gives the sun a chance to work on the road and dry up the mud puddles after a rain.

Good ventilation in the dairy barn is essential to the production of pure milk. The spread of tuberculosis during recent years has been in large part due to the shutting up of cows in close stables, where all must breathe the same air and the same germs. In such a stable a single tuberculosis cow will spread the disease to the whole herd.

It is said that the increasing use of vegetables is tending to the lengthening in the life of the caucasian race. When populations were more sparse than now, animal food and fish were easier to get than now. Only in late centuries have such vegetables as potatoes, tomatoes and many forms of cabbages come into general use. It is certainly true that the eating of fresh vegetables greatly assists digestion of all foods.

Friend Thorson delivered himself of this bit of wisdom the last time I saw him: "Some men ain't fit to own cows. They don't treat 'em right. But take away the milk and the cream and the butter and their meat, and don't give 'em even a smell of cheese, and they'd begin to realize what the cows were doing for them." Thorson is one of those fellows who believes it pays to be kind to your stock; to see they are sheltered from the sun, have plenty of fresh water, and are protected in some way from the plague of flies. And it does!

Acording to an English scientific journal milk poor in fat is as valuable a food as milk rich in fat. The fat percentage, the popular standard by which milk is judged, is most valuable while the proportions of the albuminoids, sugars and salts vary but little in the different samples of milk. In other words, while the energy-producing and heat-giving qualities of the several kinds of milk may be great or little, the valuable proteid ingredients, which go to the building up of the tissues—the prime property of and food—remain very much the same in all varieties of cow's milk. Thus a 'thin' milk is for all purposes, save for energy and heat production, as valuable a food as the so-called "rich" milk. Indeed, it not infrequently happens, as the experimental feeding of young growing animals has shown, that a thin milk may prove, in the long run, more flesh forming than a rich milk, inas much as the former is less liable to induce gastro-enteric disorders. Let us consider what this means: It means, first of all, that the enormous quantity of skimmilk produced in England could be turned to more economical use than the feeding of animals or the manufacture of ivory for table knives and piano keys.

SLAUGHTER IN COAL MINES.

Havoc from Explosion of Fire Damp in the Last Two Years.

Within the last few weeks there have been two explosions of gas in coal mines in this country, both of which were attended with a shocking loss of life. In the more recent instance, in Western Pennsylvania, between 200 and 250 men were either suffocated with poisonous gases or crushed to death. The earlier one, in West Virginia, found no less than 350 victims. The mortality from a single explosion in America has probably never been as great as that which resulted from one in Northern France, in March, 1906. On that occasion no less than a thousand deaths were caused. Nevertheless, owing to the increased frequency of these disasters on this side of the Atlantic, the loss of life in the last two years has been simply appalling. According to a bulletin of the United States Geological Survey, the average number of deaths from explosions in 1906 was about six a day, or, for the whole twelve months, about 2,200. Full returns for 1907 are not yet available, but it should cause no surprise if it surpassed the record of the previous year. It looks as if a ghastly rivalry had been instituted by the coal mines and railroads of the country.

In the majority of cases it is probable that these explosions are due to carelessness. Sometimes the charges of powder used in blasting are ignited in a working where gas is present, and not infrequently the workmen expose the flame of their lamps under similar circumstances. Heroic attempts to rescue miners who are imprisoned by an explosion are often made, but are seldom successful. The most which can be accomplished at such a time is usually to recover the bodies of the dead. It would seem to be an easy matter to prevent such accidents, but neither legislation nor voluntary effort has yet been entirely successful.

The dangerous character of the gas which works such awful havoc is fully recognized, both by the miners and the owners of the mines, and when it escapes in threatening quantities from the veins of a mine its presence can be easily detected. That its unfortunate effects are not averted more thoroughly by adequate precautions, therefore, is little short of a mystery.

HUNTING BEARS IN ALASKA.

Grant Chase Has Killed 2,000-Pound Grizzlies—Lots of Them.

There is good bear hunting on the Alaskan peninsula. I got seven grizzlies one afternoon, all of them within a quarter of a mile and not over half an hour's time. The smallest of them was a three-year old, and I should say they averaged 2,000 pounds. It took 13 cartridges to bring the seven down."

Grant G. Chase, hunter and prospector, who for 11 years has spent most of his time in the Alaskan wilds, talked thus to a Chicago Post reporter.

For corroboration there was the testimony of Mrs. Chase, who for several years has shared her husband's life and who has kept a diary wherein is faithfully recorded the number of bear, caribou, sea otter and other fur bearers brought down daily and careful measurements of the biggest skins.

"I suppose I have killed 500 or 600 bears altogether," continued Mr. Chase. "Of course, a good deal of my time has been given to some copper proprieties I am interested in or the number might have been much larger. At one time and another I have hunted bear pretty much all through the Rockies, but there isn't another place to equal the Alaskan peninsula.

"Big? Well, I'll tell you. Those bears up there are the largest in the world. A fullgrown male weighs from 2,000 to 2,500 pounds. The skin of the largest fellow I ever killed measured 13 feet 4 inches long and 13 feet 3 inches spread from toenail to toenail. I can lift as much as the average man, but I'm telling it straight when I say that with Mrs. Chase to help me I couldn't turn that fellow over on his back to skin him.

"Twenty feet is the nearest a bear, bent on mischief, ever got to me. An old female, whose cub I had brought down, came for me one day and she was mad. She was 60 or 70 yards distant and in a bunch of alder when I took my first shot at her. She got up and came out in the clearing and then she saw me and came for me in earnest. I worked my gun pretty rapidly and the shots took effect. She was about six paces away when she dropped.

"Mrs. Chase and I got a scare once, though, in rather a ludicrous way. I had three camps in a lonely region where for three years Mrs. Chase never saw a white woman. I had put up 'bavraias,' or houses, of draft wood, the only kind available. We were going from one camp to another when I brought down a bear.

"We were in no hurry, so we stopped, built a fire and had some lunch. After lunch—about an hour after the shooting—we went down into a gulch where the bear was lying. Mrs. Chase was carrying an aluminum teapot. I got her to help me turn the bear over, and I was about to remove the hide when the big fellow suddenly came to life.

"You should have seen Mrs. Chase go up that hillside. The best of it was, in spite of her haste, she took time to rescue her teapot. I believe I jumped about 20 feet myself. If that bear had been in shape to do damage there might have been some trouble—but he wasn't. As a general thing there isn't much adventure—it's too easy."

A FAMOUS ELECTRICIAN.

How the Obstacles to Ocean Telegraphy Were Overcome.

A man died in Glasgow a week or two ago who combined to a remarkable degree the qualities of the scientific investigator and the practical inventor. He was known to the world chiefly for his study of the laws of electricity and his provision for putting the mysterious force into man's service. Sir William Thomson (known as Lord Kelvin after he was elevated to the peerage) was closely identiffed with the great enterprise which gave Cyrus W. Field world wide fame. The difficulties attending telegraphy under the water were much greater than those encountered with a land wire. Electric signals sent through a submarine cable—at least one long enough to to cross the ocean—undergo a peculiar retardation which once threatened to blur them beyond recognition. Faraday had long before furnished a partial key to the evil, but Thomson supplied the remedy. By his advice it was made possible to design a cable so that a reasonably satisfactory clearness and speed could be secured. The correctness of his statement of the laws involved was disputed by an electrician of the cable company, Dr. Wildman Whitehouse, but the Glasgow expert disposed of the argument so effectively that he was retained on the seat as consulting engineer. He officiated in that capacity both for the cable of 1838 and that of 1866. He was also electrical engineer for the French Atlantic cable in 1869, the Brazilian and River Plate cable in 1873, the West Indian in 1875 and the Mackay-Bennett Atlantic cable in 1879.

He contributed to the success of these enterprises in several other ways. He prescribed a method of testing the conductivity of a submarine wire while it was being laid, in order that any defect might be promptly discovered and cured. He also invented instruments wherewith to receive messages. Those employed for land wires were not sensitive enough, Thomson so mounted a mirror on a tiny magnet that the feeble electric impulses which traversed a cable would cause it to sway. A beam of light was thus deflected, first to the right and then to the left, on a blank white wall in a dark room. The magnet was suspended by a silk fibre, and its movements were practically unimpeded by friction. The invention would leave a permanent trace on a slip of paper. It was called the 'isiphon recorder.' Use was made of it to receive some of the greetings sent in to its author in 1896. Without question he did more than any other scientific man to promote submarine telegraphy, and that was the cause of his being knighted in 1866. Subsequently he devised a sending key for use with a cable, and he did much to perfect apparatus for taking deep sea soundings while a ship was under way, thus greatly facilitating the exploration of cable routes.

Among Lord Kelvin's other inventions was an instruction for measuring charges of electricity. He also provices which have been of much value to the mariner. He so improved a construment of ths compass as to overcome the influence of a ship's magnetism on that instrument.

IMPORTS FOR JULY, 1907.

Increase Has Much Significance for Thinking Men.

Imports for July, 1907, amounted to $124,764,063, against $102,592,449 for July, 1906; increase, $22,171,614. Of dutiable and competitive goods the value imported in July, 1907, was $67,880,301, being an increase of $6,533,935 over July of last year. The non-dutiable imports for July, 1907, amounted to $56,883,702; increase over July, 1906, $15,637,679.

On its face this increase in the value of competitive goods, $6,533,935, does not appear to be more than normal. It is, in fact, less than the increase of July, 1906, over July, 1905, which was $12,770, 649.

The fact that this rate of increase was not maintained for July, 1907, may turn out to be due to a decrease in the invoice values of the merchandise imported. The truth as to this cannot be accurately ascertained until a comparison shall have been made between quantities imported in July, 1906, and July, 1907, respectively.

Under the terms of the export price privilege which went into operation July 1, 1907, the local chambers of commerce of Germany, France and Great Britain are permitted to name the dutiable values of goods exported to the United States. Previous to July 1, 1907 the basis of dutiable value was the current wholesale market price in the exporting country.

It is important to know the extent to which dutiable values have been affected by this "export price" privilege. If there has been a general reduction in invoiced values, the increase of $6,533,835 over the value of dutiable goods imported in July, 1906, carries with it a much larger proportion of increase in quantities.

Domestic producers will expect from the department of commerce and labor, at the earliest moment practicable, a comparative statement showing quantities of dutiable imports for the month of July in 1906 and 1907, and for succeeding months. In no other way can the whole truth be ascertained as to the practical workings of the "export price" privilege. And the whole truth is wanted as promptly as possible.

Has Been Buncoed.

Senator Allison, of Iowa, has no illusions concerning the scheme of revising the tariff through reciprocity. He says: "The danger of attempting to fix tariff rates by means of individual treaties negotiated by the president and approved by the senate lies in the fact that it involves the raising of revenue without the consent of the house of representatives, whereas the house is specifically given by the constitution the exclusive right to originate all revenue measures. It is a bad thing to split up the two houses of congress and set them at odds, with the president necessarily siding with one of them. That is inevitable when a treaty is negotiated which seeks to change the duties fixed by both houses of congress. It gives to the president legislative functions he was not intended to exercise, and ignores the one branch of congress which the constitution intended to have all the power of initiative over revenues." It is on the grounds stated by the senator that the constitutionality of the jug-handled German reciprocity just negotiated by the president and Secretary Root is to be tested in the courts. There is not the shadow of a doubt that this country has been buncoed in this treaty.—Bay City Tribune.

TEMPERANCE NOTES

AN IMPEDIMENT TO CLIMBING.

Opinion of Alpine Guides as to Effect of Alcohol.

Is alcohol of use to mountain climbers? At a recent meeting in Berne of the Swiss Alpine club, Dr. Schnyder gave the results of some inquiries he had made. He consulted a number of climbers, and found that 72 per cent. of them always take wine or liquor along on a tour. The guides do the same. Yet there is a consensus of opinion that alcoholic drinks are an impediment to climbing, and should never be taken before the summit is attained, except in cases of great depression or sudden sickness. The effect of alcohol on brain workers has lately been tested by a similar method by a Dutch alienist, Dr. van Vleuten, who addressed his questions to 150 German men of letters, as well as by an association of Swedish students, who sought the opinions of artists as well as writers. In both these enquetes the majority pronounced the effect of alcoholic drink to be detrimental to inspiration. Auguste Rodin wrote: "Alcohol is not for artists. Those who seek their inspiration in it are, like their works, doomed to early oblivion." Gustav Frenssen said: "A thimbleful of alcohol suffices to weaken my faculties." Bjornstjerne Bjornson confessed that if he drank only a glass more than his usual amount with his dinner, he had to suffer for it the next day. He has always discarded literary sketches made under the stimulus of wine, having found them unnatural or morbid.

A POOR EXAMPLE.

A TERRIBLE PICTURE.

The Ravages Which Alcohol Is Working in Norway.

The published report of Dr. Lerop, head of the Evreux asylum, and a medical health officer of Norway, has found its way into British papers, and forms a truly terrible study in the ravages of alcohol.

The report shows that the consumption of alcohol in Norway has risen enormously in the last 50 years, with the following results:

The mortality has risen from 22 per cent. to 26 per cent., the majority of deaths resulting from diseases due to alcohol; the number of crimes has increased from 4.6 per thousand to 8.7, the offenses committed being mainly crimes of violence, the majority of which were due to inebriety.

Dr. Lerop states as associate facts the rapidly increasing number of men found unfit for military service; the largely increased number of suicides; the birth rate diminished one-half; and the number of insane quadrupled during this period.

Holds Saloon Responsible.

"Let America profit by the lesson."

"As a judge I have faced the woes, the trials, the miseries and broken homes of society caused only by the want of a proper solution of this problem of problems.

"Thousands and thousands of homes have been broken up, caused by the traffic in intoxicants.

"I have divorced 4,000 people. I have tried no less than 6,000 children in the past six years.

"This lamentable social condition is traceable in a large degree to the saloon."—Judge Ben E. Lindsay, Denver, Colo.

The Hope of a Democracy Lies in Education

By PRESIDENT ALBERT BOYNTON STORMS,
Iowa State College.

DEMOCRACY is more than a political experiment. It is the latest spiritual enterprise of the ages. Though not yet complete nor permanent, democracy is the crowning achievement of history. Democracy is an ideal, a leaven, not to be identified absolutely with any political or social organization.

Critics of democracy have generally overlooked its fundamental ethical principles. The first of these is that democracy does not mean government by the least fit, the ignorant, the mob, but government by majorities and majorities created by ideas and ideals.

The peril of republics is ever before us—the peril that springs from ignorance and from a lack of intelligent patriotism. Other forms of government may survive indefinitely over a stolid and nonprogressive people. Republics cannot live without virtue.

Democracy has encouraged the broadening of the scope of education. Older colleges and educational ideals are conservative and aristocratic, but classical culture and the humanities alone are inadequate. The school must teach the real interests of life for a working people. The sturdy youth in laboratories and shops, drafting rooms and field, with life's real business before them, have brushed aside intellectual dilletttantism. Science and art have meaning for life's earnest work as well as for its leisure pastimes.

Higher education, however, in a democracy cannot be adequately based nor adequately provided except by the people themselves. A Democratic people do not thrive best in any of their interests by being paternally and patronizingly endowed by benevolence. It is only by self-assertion and by institutions that are organized and equipped and maintained by the people's own will and at their cost that a Democratic society can adequately provide for its higher educational needs as well as for its other social and political requirements.

Is democracy favorable to the enthusiasm of the scholar? This, too, is a question that still awaits answer. In all ages that history pronounces great, the scholar has stood forth with torch in hand to guide men to the fountains of living waters and to the serene heights of intellectual and spiritual outlook and inspiration. Other men may lie down to sleep in the furrows which they have plowed or by the heaps of metal which they have dug from the mine, but the scholar, like the Christ, seeks the mountain side and the night and the silence, and when he comes to mingle with the people and to put his hands to his daily task, it is with a touch of power. His soul grips the commonplace and transfuses it with the light of the spirit. Democracy cannot do without the scholar.

No Need of Being a Has-Been

By G. ELLIOT FLINT,
Author of "Power and Health Through Progressive Exercise."

An athlete should improve constantly while training, and he should calculate this period so as to meet his opponent or opponents at the time—and not much after—he has reached his best condition. The contest over, he should go out of training but continue to exercise. But thus nursing his reserve force he may remain formidable for many years, and thereafter each successive time he trains he ought to be a better man than he was in any previous training. Several months should elapse between trainings. An athlete with good habits ought to last athletically until he is past 50. Weston, at 68, is now apparently at his best. But athletes who keep constantly on edge are apt to break down.

How hard it is for athletes to hold their own after they have attained their highest condition is shown by the many that "go stale" before the contest they have trained for takes place. Oarsmen, prize-fighters and football men frequently break down in their training if it has been begun too early.

I have said that those out of training should exercise. The difference between exercise and training is considerable. While the prolonged or constantly recurring supreme efforts that constitute training proper are wearing and in the end devitalizing, the regular moderate efforts proceeding from exercise are a necessary condition of our normal development and well-being. One who keeps in fair condition by exercise can easily get into his highest condition by training, but in this latter state he should not remain longer than two or three months. Do well always; your utmost only occasionally.

All know that some organs never rest for even one minute. The heart pumps blood while life lasts; the lungs expand and contract unceasingly, and the innumerable organs concerned in absorption, secretion and excretion are constantly active. Activity, then, is a necessary condition of life, so that the man who remains persistently inactive, or who is active only when he occasionally trains, is not living physiologically as he should, and, is therefore, not long to survive.

The Power of Woman

By PROF. GUY CARLETON LEE,
Johns Hopkins University.

The man who searches effect for cause must find his goal most often in the influence of a woman. Not always for good: that could not be. But it would seem that all that has endured has been for good, and that the evil which has been wrought by woman—and it has not been slight—has been ephemeral in all respects. I know of no enduring evil that can be traced to a woman as its source; but I know of no constant good which did not find either its beginning or its fostering in a woman's thought or work. Poppaea leaves but a name: Agrippina leaves an example. It may be true of men that the evil that they do lives after them, while the good is oft interred with their bones; but it is not true of women. Of course, there is a sense in which it is true—in the descent from mother to son of the spirit of the unrighteous mother; but even this would not seem to hold as a rule, and the effects are often modified by the influence of a love for a higher nature. The sum of woman's influence upon the destinies of the world is good, the balance inclines steadily toward the best. Woman is the hope of the world.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 31. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JANUARY 9 1908. NUMBER 45

THE HISTORY (?) OF MARYLAND.

Text Book In Use By Public School Children Full of Errors.

To the Editor of The Republican:

A few days ago I picked up a copy of a text book used in the public schools of our county, "The Leading Events of Maryland History," it being the revised edition of the work.

I am surprised that a work containing so many inaccuracies and misstatements should be used as a text book on Maryland history in our public schools.

Of course no historian can please everybody and we do not expect perfection in him any more than in other people, but it does seem to me that the revised edition of this work should have been more correct and the errors which appeared in the original or first edition should have been corrected in the revised edition. Take the article on Garrett county. With all due respect to the author of this article we do not think that there is a teacher in our county but what would have done better. In the list of Garrett county towns we find that of "Friendship." Doubtless this was intended for Friendsville, as the name of that progressive town does not appear. Then we are told that "the rivers and streams of the county abound with game fish, bass and trout, and deer, pheasants and wild turkeys, etc., make it the same sportsmen's paradise it was in the days Meshach Browning, hunter and author."

This is certainly "news" to the most of us as we had supposed that conditions had changed very materially since the days when Meshach Browning had performed his great feats as a hunter, the stories of which we read and were delighted in our boyhood days.

Surely the author of this article on our great county (which will in the future become one of the leading agricultural counties of the State) must be taking a Rip Van Winkle sleep, and it does seem to me that the children of our county are entitled to something better as a text book of the history of our great State than they are given in this book.

Then on page 207 we are given a picture of a "Granite Quarry, Woodstock County." Mr. Editor where is Woodstock County? Is it on the Eastern "Shore" or in Western Maryland? The idea of a text book used in our public school talking about "Woodstock county."

Some of us think perhaps the little town of Woodstock on the mainline of the B. & O. R. R., between Relay and Mt. Airy is perhaps intended as there are stone quarries there, but Woodstock County, Oh, my!

These errors are in the revised edition. In my opinion there should be another revision of this work and that as speedily as possible or its use should be discontinued in our public schools.

Better have no guide than a false one, and our children should be given text books which are correct.

Very respectfully,
A. F. GEORGE.

FOR BETTER ROADS.

A Corresnondent Suggests Means of Bettering the Highways.

There has been considerable talk about better roads through the county papers and other papers and journals, but all has failed to bring the desired effect, not because the sentiment of the writer was not right but because there is not enough interest taken by the right parties. First, the taxpayers should be interested in general; second, the county commissioners; third, the supervisors and unless this is done road affairs are likely to go on the come day, go day style.

There does not seem to be much law governing road affairs. If there is it never has been enforced, at least we would have to draw that conclusion from observation, knowing there has been money levied an certain portions of road and four summers have passed and no work done by the supervisor or by his orders on certain portions of road referred to. That portion of road becomes dangerous to ride or drive over. There surely must be something materially wrong concerning such affairs as this.

It is my opinion before there will be any great improvement in road affairs there will have to be some considerable changes made, for instance weed out the supervisors down to one or two to each district, get the right man in the right place, give him something to do with and he will do something that will be of benefit. Give the supervisor $2.50 per day and the men that work under him $2 per day, hire able bodied men and see that they do honest work and in three years there will be improvements in Garrett county roads. Able bodied men can't be expected to work on public roads for 50 or 75 cents less per day than they can get else where, that is not business. Why not get out of the old ruts of paying $1.25 per day and hiring boys to do men's work and get but little done. Pay the price and get the work. The farmers pay more taxes each year, and I suppose all other property owners do the same. Are we getting the benefit of it in the right way?

EXPLOSION OF A LARGE B. & O. ENGINE

Engineer Frank Smith of Piedmont Slightly Hurt.

WAS BLOWN OUT OF THE CAB.

Force of Explosion Hurled Firebox From Engine Which Was Reduced to Scrap Iron—No Other Casualties—Fearful Force of Explosion.

With a loud report, which could be heard for several miles, B. & O. engine 1772 blew up near Altamont tower, on the Seventeen Mile Grade, at 5:30 o'clock Monday morning, injuring Engineer Frank Smith, residing on Fairview street, Piedmont, W. Va. Mr. Smith was blown out of the cab of his engine for nearly a distance of 150 yards below the bank, where he was found shortly afterwards by Engineer Savage Dayton, of a train ahead. He was found lying on his face, in an unconscious condition. He was picked up by Mr. Dayton with the assistance of his fireman and others, and brought to his home in Piedmont on B. & O. passenger train No. 8, accompanied by Dr. Henry W. McComas, of Oakland, who was summoned immediately after the accident, being on the scene within half an hour after the explosion occured.

From what could be learned, engine 1772, which is used as a helping engine from Piedmont, pushing trains up the grade, had stopped below Altamont block, and the fireman had gone up in the telegraph tower for orders, the engine having previously uncoupled from a train which it had pushed up the hill. While waiting for the fireman to return, the engine let go with fearful effect, the force of the explosion hurling the firebox back into the tender, breaking the couplings and sending it back on the track a distance of several hundred yards.

The ground and track for a considerable space had a gaping hole torn in it, as if wrecked by an earthquake. In the short space of time, the locomotive, 1772, a large engine of the "turtleback" class, was a mass of unrecognizable wreckage.

As soon as they could the fireman, operator and several of the crew of the train ahead began to search for the missing engineman, and several minutes elapsed before his apparently lifeless form was found yards away below the tracks. The injured man was made as comfortable as possible. How he escaped from instant death seems almost miraculous.

An examination of Mr. Smith was made by Dr. McComas and two Piedmont physicians, but they were unable to locate any broken bones, or even an abrasion of the skin. The probabilities are that he will suffer no serious consequences as the result of his miraculous experience.

HIS SOUND GOSPEL.

The Drummer Gives The Country Storekeeper Some Pointers.

"I was just reading in the Atlanta Constitution," said the traveling man, "that the National Association of R. F. D. men is going to meet in Atlanta. The Constitution goes on to remark that these men are doing more to make rural life happy and comfortable than any other body of men in the nation."

"R. F. D.—rural free delivery! Huh!" grunted the owner of the general store in the Arkansas town in front of which the group of local citizens and the drummer were spending a warm October afternoon hour.

"Why do you say it in that tone of voice?" the drummer inquired.

"Simply because," the storekeeper replied, "these rural free mail fellows are beginning to knock the tar out of business in towns like this. It's not their fault, of course. They're government employees, and they must carry the mails, no matter what goes in the mails. They are beginning to have their wagons stocked up with packages ordered by mail from the big cities and delivered through the mails right at the door of the farmer's house. You sell dry goods and things. Don't you see that this thing is going to hurt your business as well as mine? If it keeps up I'll have to decrease my orders from you. So it's up to you and me to organize a mutual howling society. Misery loves company, you know."

One of the farmers in the group suddenly felt in his inside coat pocket for those three letters which his wife and daughters had handed him to give to the rural delivery man as he came along the road. They were addressed to stores in St. Louis and Chicago.

The drummer smiled.

"I quoted that stuff from the Atlanta paper," he said, "just to wake you up on this subject. I knew what you would say. But we don't want any mutual howling society. What we want is a mutual self preservation society, or, rather, that is what you people in this community want. You can't buck up against the eternal spirit of progress. Uncle Sam has established the rural mail delivery, and it is being widened constantly. Every day new routes are being created. That paper is right in saying the service adds much to happiness and comfort in the country. People on the farms now get their letters and their newspapers every day instead of waiting till the man hitches up for the Saturday afternoon drive to town. They know every day what is going on in the world, and a daily paper helps mightily to relieve the monotony of lonesomeness of farm life."

"It sure does," put in the farmer. "I'm a regular subscriber to our local daily now as well as the weekly. All my folks like to read the papers."

"Sure," assented the drummer. "Now, the point is this. You merchants want to keep your trade and not let it go to the mail order houses. Very well. You've got to do some preaching to the farmer folks, not to speak of the town folks, who also patronize the mail order stores considerably. You ought to organize a home trade league, or you might better call it a local improvement society. That would take in the farmers as well as your townspeople. Hire a hall and a brass band, too, if necessary to get a crowd. Preach the doctrine that every dollar circulating at home makes home a better place to live in. That's good sound gospel. A town or community with its cash tied up in tomato cans or sealed up in envelopes directed out of town, which is practically the same thing, is not likely ever to fall over its own feet in making progress. Money in circulation is the life blood of a community. Otherwise there is nothing but stagnation. Town business will stagnate. Farm property will stagnate. You townspeople and the farmers around here are mutually dependent. If your store has to go to the wall and quit business and the store up the street closes and the town is full of empty houses, that is going to decrease the value of farm property.

"Now, the R. F. D. men have no choice. They've got to deliver the mails. They also deliver, as you know, the local papers. Likewise they deliver to some of the farmers the big city papers. I saw in a St. Louis daily the other day a two page advertisement of a big mail order house there. I found that paper at your hotel here. You local merchants must compete with that paper. You must use your local paper to do it. Suppose you follow the advertisements of that particular house in the city paper and make up a list of bargains you have in your own store and advertise them in your own paper? You can meet lots of those bargains and beat 'em. Then with your mutual aid society well organized, with some of the farmers occupying some of the official positions, you ought before very long to work up a sentiment for home trade that will make your business take an upshoot. I'm handing you the straight goods. It's up to you."

"I'm in," said the farmer who had forgotten to mail the letters. "Sounds to me like good common sense talk."

THE DEATH RECORD.

DWIGHT FOSS CASTEEL.

Dwight Foss, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Casteel, was born May 19th, 1907, and died December 31st, 1907, aged 7 months and 12 days. He was a sweet, promising child, loved by his parents and all the family, but has been taken by the Savior, who said "Suffer the little children to come to me, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." He is now a lamb of the upper fold. The parents have the sympathy of all in this vicinity.

EDWARD TAYLOR.

From the Grafton Republican of last Friday afternoon the following notice of the death of Mr. Edward Taylor, of Century, West Va., was clipped:

Word was received in the city this morning of the death, at Cook's Hospital, Fairmont, of Mr. Edward Taylor of Century, who had been taken to that institution some days ago and operated on surgically for relief from appendicitis. Death came at five-thirty o'clock last evening, and the remains were taken through here this morning on train No. 8 to Piedmont, where a brother, Mr. Creed Taylor resides. The funeral will occur tomorrow morning at eleven-thirty o'clock, at the Patterson creek cemetery, about twelve miles from Piedmont, near where the deceased gentleman formerly operated a large farm and where members of his family are buried. Mr. Taylor was well and favorably known to a number of people in Grafton. He was united in marriage a few years ago to Miss Tina Connell of Hutton, Md., a sister of Miss Ellen Connell and of Mrs. Parley DeBerry of Terra Alta. Besides the widow, he leaves several daughters, by a first wife, to mourn the demise of an indulgent and ever tender husband and father. Rev. J. A. McClelland, pastor of the First Presbyterian church this city, has been called to Piedmont to officiate at the funeral, and will leave this evening on train No. 12 for that point. The friends of the family in this city will regret exceedingly to learn of the demise of Mr. Taylor and will sympathize most heartily with the bereaved ones.

BUYING GOLD ABROAD

Methods Employed in Its Purchase and Shipment.

NOT A COMPLEX TRANSACTION

The Simple System by Which Foreign Bullion or Coin Arriving by Ship in New York is Turned into American Money The Loss by Abrasion.

Buying $10,000,000 worth of gold from the Bank of England, says the cashier of the subtreasury in New York, is no more complex a transaction than buying a piece of real estate. Whatever difference there is in the two is in favor of the gold purchase. In it you are pretty sure to get the value of your money.

Much of the gold bought by the large banking houses of New York and other American cities is purchased from the Bank of England or the Bank of France. Its purchase is arranged for by the English or French agents of the bank that wishes to secure the gold. The price that will have to be paid depends largely upon the demand. In panic times, when every dollar of gold that can be secured is being eagerly sought by the bankers here, the price is as high as 5 and 6 per cent.

The shipment of the gold is accompanied by comparatively few extra precautions, an extra detective or two from Scotland Yard, perhaps, and as many other private detectives employod by the Bank of England furnish all the protection needed.

All gold imported into this country comes in one or two forms. It is either in gold bars or in coin. If in coin it is usually American money that has been sent abroad in some previous year, for a comparatively small amount of foreign gold coin is brought here. Whether in bar or coin, however, it is all shipped in small steel cases. The bars of an exact length, so as to permit them being packed tightly in the cases, while the coins are in bags, irrespective of denomination, that hold just 500 ounces.

The arrival of a gold laden ship at her pier in the North river is no different, so far as precautions for the gold itself are concerned, from that of any other vessel. There are always government officials, city police and private detectives to meet each ship, and the arrival of a boat with $10,000,000 in gold aboard will result in no more than one or two extra men being present to ride on the wagons carrying the gold away from the pier.

The steel boxes, with their precions contents, as they are carted down from the ship to the wharfs might from their appearance contain only ordinary merchandise. If any unusual precautions be taken, however, it is during the brief moments that the boxes with their millions are lying on the pier waiting to be lifted into the wagons and carted away. Then they are watched by a good many pairs of eyes, and not a stranger is allowed to approach anywhere near them.

The final act of the purchase of gold differs in times of panic and at ordinary times. In times of panic, when the necessity for gold is so great that every moment is precious, its real value in relieving a situation comes only when it is piled high on the counters of the banks and trust companies awaiting the demands of the creditors of those institutions.

The gold that arrives in bars goes direct to the assay office. Before any attempt is made to analyze it and ascertained its real value the purchaser receives a certified check from the assayer for 98 per cent of the value supposed to be contained in the bars. The check can be converted into cash immediately, and the delay of two or three days necessary to make a complete assay of the shipment is avoided. Whatever additional sum is due the purchaser after the assayer's report is made he receives in a day or two.

Much the same process so far as expediency is concerned is gone through with the gold coins. They, instead of going to the assay office, go direct to the subtreasury. Each bag is weighed unopened and if found to tip the scale at 500 ounces $6,300 in cash is immediately advanced. That process saves many hours, for each bag has to be opened, the coins assorted into their several denominations, counted and weighed for loss from abrasions. After that is done the money is returned to bags containing $5,000 each, and the balance due the purchaser, whatever it may be is forwarded to him.

The only other class of gold shipment that has to be handled is that of foreign gold coins. They are not even counted, but are placed immediately in a crucible, melted and then sent to the assay office, where they are treated as were the gold bars. The extra time necessto secure actual American money for the gold coins of foreign nations is the chief reason for the small amount of gold imported in that form.

As between shipping gold in coin or bars there is little difference It is said that the motion of the ships causes a loss of about $200 in every shipment of $1,000,000. It is a fact, however, that the coins do lose considerably more in weight than the bars.—New York World.

PROHIBITION'S GROWTH.

Not since the days of abolition has any great ethical principle made such a fight for recognition by our political system as prohibition has within the last few years. Like the abolition movement, the struggle for prohibition had an insignificant local beginning, and was, at first, a vital principle only to women's societies and unimportant men, who were led by a single individual of extraordinary power. But after Garrison came Wendell Philips, Lucy Larcom, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and others, whose eloqnence made new converts to their cause every day, and in time set the whole country afire with it. Likewise, prohibition took the mantle of Neal Dow and cast over the shoulders of John B. Gough, and after him came a score of others, with the late Francis Murphy among them. Abolition lived half a century, then reached its zenith, and expire dwith the blood and smoke of a great war which it had stirred up. But that war was its creation and its servants, doing its work, and it died only because its work was done. Prohibition has existed half a century now, and perhaps has not arrived at its zenith, but it has reached a tremendous height and is spreading all over the country in leaps and bounds greater than those of abolition, except in its later days. Its issue will not be left to the sword, as was that of its great forerunner, but it will put its trust in the ballot and in the war of ballots there will surely come a Gettysburg.

Prohibition as an issue has come to stay, either to victory or until it is decisively wiped out at the polls. It is no longer a fad. It has proved its right to existence by its healthy growth, and the two great political parties can no longer shoulder it out of the way. They must meet it squarely, and one of them will either have to take it into camp as a friendly power and an ally or beat it down. It may not be a national issue in next year's political campaign, but it will be in the campaign of 1912, if it continues its present marvelous growth. Out of the eighty-odd millions of people in the United States, on January 1 there will be 33,000,000 living directly under absolute prohibition. What is the use of pretense or evasion or denial in the face of those figures? Such an army as that cannot be brushed aside lightly.

A SURGICAL TRIUMPH.

Professor Flexner Transplants Blood Channels Of Animals.

After two years of experiment and exhaustive study, Professor Simon Flexner, head of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, in New York city, has succeeded in transplanting arteries from our animal to another successfully. That fact has been revealed in a paper just read before the physiological section of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in the University of Chicago.

It is the first time in the history of the world, surgeons assert, that so difficult a feat of surgery has been accomplished. Whether the surgical innovation will be perfected to such a degree that it can be applied to the treatment of aneurism and other arterial diseases is still an open question. That, however, is the end aimed at by Professor Flexner and his assistants in the Rockefeller Institute. It is admitted it is a long cry between performing such an operation on an animal and performing it on a human being, but surgeons are hopeful. The understanding here is that John D. Rockefeller, founder of the institnte, has been keeping in close touch with the experiments and is delighted because of their success.

It is admitted on all sides that if the experiments should be extended to men and women with the same success that has attended those made on animals, thousands of lives will be saved annually in all sections of the world. Aneurism, for instance, will lose its terrors, and so will many other diseases of the arteries which now are regarded as practically incurable. Aneurism is a localized dilation of an artery due to pressure of blood acting on a part of the artery weakened by accident or by disease.

A patient afflicted with this breaking down of the walls of the artery simply would have to go to a hospital, get on the operating table, and the surgeons would cut out diseased section of the artery and splice in a new section of corresponding length and diameter taken from an animal. Nobody denies that it would be hard on the animal, but it would enjoy the distinetion of having died to save human life.

There are optimists who assert that a somewhat similar process could be applied to the lungs, liver, kidneys and other parts of the body, substituting healthy animal tissue for unhealthy human tissue. The professors in the institute make no such assertions. They rest upon the plain statement that they have demonstrated conclusively, not once, but several times within the last two years, that arteries may be transplanted from one animal to another and that the second animal will live.

Professor Flexner could not come to Chicago to read his paper on "Tendencies in Pathology," which contained announcement of his great surgical discovery. He sent it to Prof. Ludwig Hegtoen, who read it. Pending its appearance in the medical journals the university officials refuse to make the text public. It is known, however, that Professor Flexner prepared it with great care, so no extravagant claims would be made which might bring ridicule upon the institute. He would not even assert that the principle could be extended to human beings, but the framing of his paper on that point indicated clearly he believed that ultimately it would be.

Many animals were sacrificed to science in the institute before final success was obtained. Experiments were made on several kinds of beasts. Most of them were small, including rats, mice, guinea pigs and rabbits. Incidentally, Professor Flexner and his assistants discovered, in their artery-splicing tests, important things in relation to biological conditions of tumor growth. The paper which presaged such far-reaching effect on pathological problems has attracted much attention here.

"Take tumor, for instance, from the laymen's point of view and discussing it as a layman would," one surgeon said, "and it will be seen at once what a successful extension of the transplanting of arteries to human beings would mean. There are thousands of persons who are suffering from tumors which cannot be removed because they have formed themselves about arteries, the removal of which would spell death.

"Under the Flexner plan a surgeon would be able to cut out both the tumor and the part of the artery incased in the growth and then fill in the arterial gap with a section of artery taken from an animal. In a few weeks the artery would be performing its function as usual, and the patient would be convalescent. It is not enough, however, to demonstrate that the artery of an animal can be transplanted to a man or a woman. Experiment must show that the section transplanted will serve its purpose as long as the sections of the artery not transplanted, and not withstand the blood pressure only for a few weeks or a few months."

THE THINGS TO PRINT

Everybody Can Give Pointers to The Editor.

There is hardly a newspaper reader in any community who, in his own estimation, could not conduct a paper better than the local editors do. And each one of these literary geniuses differ as to what a newspaper should be. Some demand that all the sporting news shall be published down to the most minute details, others hold that the full details of the market report, both local and foreign, should be printed, others still wonder why some obscure quarrel which happened late at night in the lower end of the city was reported, although it never was reported to the police, while a few would everlastingly criticise every public official in the city every day.

These different classes could be properly educated into the newspaper business in a few years, but the chances are that they never will be, for the reason that they are so sure they are right that nobody could by any chance set them right.

The function of a newspaper is to print the news—all the news. It is impossible in a paper to cover every item of sports or markets because this would exclude other very important news in other departments. A newspaper must print the most important happenings in all departments of news, and this makes it impossible to go into minute details in any particular department.

But above all things a newspaper must not be personal. It is necessary sometimes to criticise the conduct of individuals and men in office, but when this is done it is not because the newspaper, or some emplove of the newspaper, has a personal grudge at the person thus criticised. It is because this criticism is in the best interests of the community, and any newspaper which thus criticises merely to satisfy a personal grudge will soon go out of business. The function of the public press is as sacred as the function of the courts and in most cases the managers and editors of newspapers keep this fact in view all the time. Fairness, justice and the truth are the three things which the journalist strives for. He way miss them sometimes, but his intentions are good.—Peoria Herald-Transcript.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE WABASH

Declares That The Cumberland-Wheeling Link Will Be Built.

Frederic A. Delano, president of the Wabash Railroad Company, was in Baltimore Tuesday as the guest of Mr. B. F. Bush, president of the Western Maryland Railroad. Mr. Delano stopped off on his way to Chicago from New York, and while in Baltimore was shown some of the Western Maryland's property. He left Tuesday afternoon for the West.

Mr. Delano spoke encouragingly of business, and incidentally, took occasion to again deny the report circulated recently about his resignation. The dispatches sent out from Chicago about the resignation quoted a "friend" of the president of the Wabash.

"The man quoted is certaialy no friend of mine," said Mr. Delano, smiling. "There was no foundation for the report."

Then speaking of conditions on the Wabash, he said.

"Business has fallen off some during the last few months, just as it has with other roads, but, in my opinton, the bottom has been reached. I think that we can now look for conditions to improve: perhaps by the middle of January, we will begin to see this improvement. I look for easier money, too. I do not mean to convey the impression that there is going to be any rapid change, a sudden withdrawal of all unfavorable conditions, as it were, but a gradual improvement."

The resumption of work at many mills in the Pittsburg district after having been idle for several weeks was referred to.

"Yes, that is a good sign," said Mr. Delano. "A great many manufacturers took advantage of the holidays to close down. I look for a continuance of the improvement which has already begun among the industrial concerns."

Mr. Delano said that the Wabash had had to take steps to curtail expenses, just as other companies have done, and that some men have been laid off, but no steps have been taken or even considered to reduce salaries, as it was announced several days ago that the Erie has done.

"When will work be started on the link to connect the Western Maryland at Cumberland and the Wabash at Wheeling?" the president of the latter road was asked.

"That's more than I can say now," Mr. Delano replied. "It depends largely on monetary conditions. I don't know what will be done during the coming year; I hope that the money market will be such as to permit of the work being started. We are anxious to get the line constructed and are going right ahead with our plans."

Mr. Delano is not a stranger in Baltimore. He has visited Baltimore bofore in connection with the affairs of the Wabash, his last visit having been last summer, when, with President Bush of the Western Maryland, he held a conference with President Murray and other Baltimore and Ohio officials regarding some matters relating to an interchange of traffic.

METHOD IN SCHEME

JACOB SCHIFF, FINANCIER, FAVORS TARIFF REDUCTION.

This Would Stop the Building Up of Great Monopolies and the Accumulation of Vast Fortunes, and Make Mr. Schiff's Money Worth More.

Money talks, but not always reasonably or intelligently. For example, Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, member of one of the world's largest banking houses and director in a dozen or so of lesser banking and loan concerns, has lately broken into print with the following:

"Nothing will so thoroughly prevent the building up of great monopolies and the accumulation of the vast fortunes, the existence of which is at the bottom of the prevailing social unrest, as a sound and sensible revision of the tariff. . . . It is right that American industry and the American workingman be protected against undue foreign competition, but it cannot be right to compel the American consumer to pay a vast profit to the manufacturer where the latter under a much lower tariff would be able to maintain himself. Herein lies the principal remedy which needs to be applied if the causes which have brought about present conditions are to be permanently eradicated."

It will be noticed that Banker Schiff's sole concern is for the consumer. Most consumers are also producers, but we are not aware that Banker Schiff is a producer. Breeder, perhaps, but not producer. He marries coin and currency together and takes the increase. He profits by the merger or corporate properties, but we have not heard that by so much as a dollar's worth he has ever advanced raw or partly finished material in value by a manufacturing process. Mr. Schiff is said to control a larger quantity of spot cash than any other one person in the United States. Naturally he is interested in enlarging to the utmost extent the purchasing power of his cash. Not being the producer of any commodity advanced in value by human labor, he would like to buy more of the products of labor with his dollars. A dear dollar and a cheap man would suit Mr. Schiff better than a cheap dollar and a dear man.

An able financier may not be an able industrialist. The man who knows how to make two coins grow where one coin grew before is not necessarily a high authority on anything but his finance. It is more than possible that he knows very little of the relation of labor cost to production cost in manufacturing and the relation of tariff to both. Quite certain it is that Mr. Schiff does not speak whereof he personally knows when he asserts that American manufacturers paying double the European rate of wages and ten times the oriental rate, could maintain themselves "under a much lower tariff." Ninety-five per cent. of the business men engaged in manufacturing, to say nothing of the 10,000,000 men who work for wages, do not agree with Banker Schiff in this matter. They do not think that American labor and production would under a much lower tariff remain as prosperous as they now are. To prove this they have an argument that even money lenders should be able to see the force of. They point to the fact that this country is now importing each year more than $800,000,000 worth of competitive products. Generally speaking, this does not indicate that the tariff is much too high.

If Mr. Schiff could spare a moment from his tariff ripping lucubrations he might discover something of direct fiscal significance in the latest trade returns. The official statistics for the seven months ending with July, 1907, show that our imports had increased, over the same period in 1906, $136,158,370, while our exports show an increase of $99,469,605. The net increase of imports for the seven months has been $36,685,756, or at the rate of $63,000,000 a year. But the showing for the month of July, 1907, is still more significant. Imports show an increase over the same month in 1906 of $22,238,517, or at the rate of nearly $267,000,000 a year; while exports for July, 1907, increased $16,861,961, or at the rate of a little over $200,000,000 a year.

This marked rate of increase of imports as compared with exports has occurred under the tariff as it is—or as it is supposed to be. When the tariff should be reduced to suit Mr. Schiff the flood of imports would enormously increase, that being the main object sought by tariff reduction. Then we should be sending gold abroad out of our banks to balance trade. At the rate imports are even now gaining upon exports our trade balance is being greatly reduced. Any further increase of the rate of gain of imports would be likely to bring on a gold exportation panic. Tariff reduction would hasten the advent of that situation.

Foolish to Force It.

That the tariff will some time have to be revised does not admit of doubter of dispute. Every intelligent man concedes that this time will eventually come, since constantly changing business conditions will naturally bring it about, but, until that time does arrive, the party would be very foolish indeed to undertake to force it. The people of this country are not slow to express their preference upon great questions of this character and when they become dissatisfied with the tariff they may be depended upon to say so in plain words. Until they so declare the president will do well to stand pat, as he has evidently decided to do.—St. Joseph (Mo.) Gazette.

Bridget's Beau

By JUDITH SPENCER.

(Copyright, by Joseph B. Bowles.)

They lived, two "single pinks," alone with their staid maid servant in the old homestead, which—being painted a delicate colonial yellow with white trimmings and dull green blinds—their irreverent niece Angelot called "the Yellow Cucumber."

Miss Anne was small and prim and timid, but Miss Penelope was tall and stately and a power much looked up to by her sister, though Angelot mischievously declared that "Aunt Pen was just as scarey as Aunt Anne, and whenever a piece of the old furniture cracked at night, they both got up and watched till morning." These two were practically alone in the great rambling house, for Bridget—mighty of hand but weak of head—had a room quite off by herself at the farther end.

These sisters each had had a romance. One had buried her lover and one had airily dismissed hers in the long ago. But if now they ever regretted the past none knew, for they were too wise to wear their hearts upon their sleeves. However it might have been, they advised Bridget almost daily during the 20 years she had lived in their service, never to think of getting married. While to merry, motherless Angelot, when she came to visit them, they always gave the contrary counsel, "Now don't be an old maid, my dear!"

Now Angelot could not be always with her aunts, and there were times when she, as well as their other relatives and all their friends, thought it unwise that they should live in that great house so entirely alone.

Burglars and fire were the two things these women feared, guarding against them yet watching for them through the years. Bridget slept like a log in her far-away room. But Miss Anne and Miss Penelope watched and listened and sniffed the air for smoke and nightly set "traps" of chairs turned upside down and buckets filled with water, before every doorway and at the head of every stair.

One winter's morning as Angelot was getting ready to go out, a telegram came for her father, a man of many affairs, who had left home on business of importance the night before. She tore it open and read:

"Damaged by fire last evening and robbed. Come immediately to

"PENELOPE AND ANNE."

"At last!" said Angelot. So she packed her bag and went up by the first train. As the carriage she had taken approached the long, low house, she scanned it searchingly for traces of the fire, but none were to be seen.

She found her aunts, Miss Penelope and Miss Anne, in a state of nerves bordering upon hysterics.

Angelot laughed. "Now, let me see," she said, "it was both burglary and fire. Poor Bridget's room was almost burned out, you say, and her very best clothes and her roll of money and her poor little trinkets are gone. You think it a mercy that the fire was discovered when it was? My, yes! Or the entire house might have been looted? Well, no; I don't think so. The thief evidently wanted exactly what he took and then set fire to the curtain, thinking so to cover up his tracks."

"No, Angelot, you're quite mistaken there! It's some hidden enemy; some one has a spite against us, and we shall be burned in our beds yet! For this isn't the villain's first attempt. Five separate times the preserve cellar has been broken into and we've found dozens of burnt matches strewn all about the place. It's a mercy we've escaped till now!"

"It's you who are all wrong!" declared Angelot. "You people have no enemies at all. Now I think that the man who has done all this is no other than Bridget's beau."

"Bridget's beau!" cried Miss Penelope and Miss Anne. "But Bridget hasn't any! That is, we never knew she had one—oh, Angelot!"

"Now, go upstairs and rest, you poor dears; try and get some sleep, while I go and interview Miss Bridget."

Bridget, nervous and trembling, at first denied, but finally confessed to the "beau," though she indignantly resented the charges which Angelot made against him.

"He was just a handsome, nice young man," she declared.

Just then the doorbell rang, and as Angelot saw that Bridget was too much upset to attend to her usual duties, she went to answer it herself.

"A handsome, nice young man!" she quoted gayly to herself upon first sight of the visitor.

"I would like to see Miss Penelope," the young man said politely. "I am Percival Lestrange, the nephew of John Delancey—"

"Oho!" thought Angelot, "and John Delancey is Aunt Pen's old lover—that is!" But she demurely said, "And I am Angelot, Miss Penelope's niece."

Percival Lestrange bowed low and Angelot, having dropped him a quaint courtesy, asked him to walk in.

Then matters proceeded more rapidly. It seemed that John Delancey—ill with rheumatism in his lonely bachelor home four miles away, where his nephew had been summoned to take care of him—had heard of this burglary and fire, and the story had gained much upon its travels. And too crippled to be able to come down himself, he had sent his nephew in his stead to offer his services to the ladies, and to stay in their house—if they would permit it—as long as they needed a man's assistance, or until the burglar and incendiary should be caught.

"It is very thoughtful and kind of your uncle," said Angelot; "but he did not know that I was here."

The young man looked at her with amusement in his eyes. "Of course not, and I perfectly understand that my services are not needed—now. Still, may I ask if you will kindly deliver my uncle's message?"

"Most willingly," said Angelot.

In the silence which followed her departure he could hear a faint voice overhead saying: "Who is it Angelot?"

"My lord, the ambassador!" the girl's gay voice replied. Then he caught no more except once when he thought he heard the mad words, "Cupid's messenger."

Five minutes elapsed before Angelot returned. There was a queer, bewildered expression on her face, though her eyes danced merrily.

"My lord," she began, but checked herself with a little laugh. "Mr. Percival Lestrange, I mean—I am bidden to tell you that my Aunt Penelope not only appreciates the thoughtful kindness of your uncle—her old friend John Delancey, whom she regrets to hear is so far from well—but she accepts you for his substitute and will be glad of your presence and protection for a night or two, at least! And I had no idea until just this minute that Aunt Pen's nerves had so entirely gone to pieces," Angelot ended quite simply.

"You must get a detective and clear up this affair to the entire satisfaction of my aunts—or they will never close their eyes again at night so long as they live!" she said. "They imagine it a plot against their property and personal safety, but I think it's something quite different. I can give you the clue, but you must follow it up and convince them with indisputable proofs."

She then regaled him with a piquant story of poor Bridget's "handsome, nice young man."

Percival Lestrange's stay at the Yellow Cucumber was five nights in duration. And to Angelot's amusement it was an evident relief to the minds of Miss Penelope and Miss Anne to have him there. They made no stranger of him—was he not John Delancey's nephew? And after all, it was a comfort, Miss Penelope reluctantly admitted, to feel that there was a man in the house at night. At least she could go to bed and sleep without being in fear of life.

On the fifth evening Percival Lestrange brought in the detective, who had gathered conclusive evidence against the suspected party. Angelot's intuition had been correct. Acting on her suggestion, the doings of Bridget's "nice young man" had been investigated, and it was found that on the night of the burglary and fire he had left the place on the midnight train, and the following day had been married to a young woman in an adjoining town. He not only seemed to have plenty of money and was spending it recklessly, but he had given his buxom bride a handsome dress and cloak—the facsimile of Bridget's missing garments, and several trinkets and bits of jewelry, including a watch and chain, all exactly answering the description of Bridget's vanished treasures.

Poor Bridget, unconvinced till then, wept loudly when the extent of her lover's treachery had been revealed to her.

And now that the mystery had been solved and the ladies' minds set at ease, Percival Lestrange felt that he had no further excuse for prolonging his stay. John Delancey had sufficiently recovered to drive over the next morning and make a call upon the ladies, and Percival had been quick to note the little flush on Miss Penelope's cheek when she welcomed her old admirer as he came in, leaning heavily on his nephew's arm, and he knew well how to interpret his uncle's unusual courtliness of manner. He caught himself wondering if time and circumstances could ever change him from an Uncle John—and saucy Angelot into a likeness of her Aunt Pen, but he smiled at the odd fancy and decided immediately against it.

And so an hour later when the uncle took his departure the nephew went with him; and the daily life at the Yellow Cucumber took on its normal aspect.

Poor Bridget was beginning to feel that there was no such fool as an old fool and that it had been ridiculous for her even to dream of getting married. While Angelot was again solemnly warned, "not to become an old maid!"

On the day following, Angelot also left for home.

Did Angelot or her over-busy father surmise, or did the young ambassador suspect what the result of elderly John Delancey's renewed visits to his old love would be?

Did the two most intimately concerned ever think for a moment that the consummation of their romance—interrupted more than a quarter of a century before—was to be brought about by the treachery and defection of poor Bridget's "handsome, nice young man?"

However that may be, in early June—the month of roses—there was a quiet wedding at the Yellow Cucumber where the new lord and protector was henceforth to dwell. And elderly John Delancey was the bridegroom and stately Miss Penelope the bride.

The following winter, in all the whirl and excitement of her first ball, Angelot and Percival Lestrange came suddenly face to face.

"My lord, the ambassador!" she exclaimed.

"I am no ambassador now," said Percival. "I come to speak only for myself. Angelot I was all wrong. I have found out my mistake. I could never wait in patience and grow old like Uncle John before I gained my heart's desire."

"Sir!"

"Angelot, listen, the winter is passing fast. I have worked hard and have earned my holiday, and in the spring I am going abroad—and I swear that I will not go alone! You love the mountains—once you told me so—and we will go to Switzerland—or to Norway—or where you will."

"But this is bribery!" said Angelot.

"It is the love of a man for you, Angelot—you may call it what name you will! I have planned for you, worked for you, dreamed of you—since the first day I saw you—and though your lips are reluctant your eyes tell me that I am winning you."

"Oh, I like your breathless manner of courtship!" said Angelot. "If that could go on forever—but marriage would end it all. No, I shall never marry—"

"But I would be your lover until the end."

"How can I be sure?" queried Angelot.

"By trying me!"

She laughed a little, but she turned her face away.

"Come down the garden path; no one can see us there," said he. And in silence they walked together, side by side.

"And now—" said Percival when they had come to its very end and were screened by the snowy pines.

She obediently lifted up her face, but as he bent over her she darted aside with a little birdlike movement and his kiss just touched her brow.

But the next moment she felt herself a close prisoner in his arms.

"My lord," she gasped, "there, let me go—I've something to say to you—"

And when he had freed her so that she could speak he saw that her eyes were dancing roguishly.

"Do you realize," she said, "the great and awful debt you owe to—Bridget's beau?"

She was instantly imprisoned again.

"Wait, listen; it's really important—you must know all. My lord, I have decided to go—to Norway, in the spring."

HAS TELEPHONE THAT TALKS.

Latest Device for Saving the Time of Business Men.

K. M. Twiner of New York is the inventor of a wonderful little instrument which he showed at the Savoy hotel to a representative of the London Daily Mail recently. It has the singular property of catching and transmitting every whisper within a radius of 15 feet, and at the same time can make its own voice heard over a considerably greater distance.

To illustrate the uses of the instrument, which he calls a "dictograph," Mr. Twiner connected it with a telephone wire communicating with an operator in another room. Having moved one of ten switches to call the attention of the operator, he stood as far from the instrument as the size of the room would allow and began to talk in ordinary tones.

To every question he asked, the instrument, a small box about 11 inches long and five deep, replied loudly and clearly. He dictated a business letter, and then asked for it to be repeated. The letter came back word for word with almost startling rapidity.

By means of the dictograph a busy man, sitting in his office, can talk to any number of managers or clerks in turn, or, by depressing all the switches, to the whole of them together. He has no need to hold a receiver in his hand. He can whisper at a distance of 15 feet, with his back turned to the instrument, and his words will be heard quite plainly at the other end of the wire, even if that end is 100 miles away.

The Hat Pin.

One woman has written a book about the folly of the hat pin, as women now use it. Meant at first for use, it is now ornamental, and should be made to correspond. She objects to bettles, lizards and so on being used to decorate the hat. She says that women should use jewels and dainty bits of gold and silver for this purpose.

Headache Cure.

To cure a headache take a quantity of black pepper and put it in a handkerchief; fold the handkerchief so that the grains cannot fall out; saturate the whole with camphor; bind this plaster on the head and lie down; when the handkerchief becomes dry saturate again with camphor; in a very few minutes the headache will be relieved and the patient will be asleep.

Asking Too Much.

They were trying to explain to the Australian bushman the principle of the curved ball. "That's all rot," he said. "It's easy enough to throw a boomerang so it will turn around and come back to you, but nobody can make me believe you can throw a round ball so it will describe a curve. These nature fakers make me tired!"

Ancient Wedding Custom.

A very ancient custom marked a recent wedding at Whitburn-by-the-Sea, near Sunderland, England. At the church door, as the bridal party left, the villagers presented a "hot pot," a mixture of eggs and ginger, made very hot. The presentation is considered a great compliment.

DISOBEYED ORDERS.

A Ticklish Night on Picket at the Fight at Chickamauga.

A correspondent of the National Tribune, an old soldier who served in the Twenty-second Indiana regiment, company I, tells the story of how he disobeyed orders while doing picket duty at Chickamauga.

"The day of Sept. 19," he says, "was spent pushing and pulling wagons up the steep mountain getting everything to the top about eight p. m., when we moved out about two miles and went into camp on a small stream. Up to this time we did not know that there was any fighting going on. My company was detailed for picket duty, and a strong picket line was put out around the camp. Col. Post rode out to our advance post and told my captain, L. S. Mayfield, to select some man whom he could trust and put him out on videt duty, at least one-half mile in advance of our picket line, and leave him there all night, as the mountain was so infested with rebel bushwhackers that it would be unsafe to relieve them at night. Capt. Mayfield called for volunteers, but the boys were all tired and no one craved the job of standing guard all night. Finally he called me and asked if I would go, and I told him I would if he and Orderly Sergeant Miller would go along and see where the post was established, and that I would do my best to hold the post till morning. Col. Post gave me my orders before I started. He said there was no countersign; that if any person approached from the outside to shoot him if I could, and fall back to camp along about midnight. Well, I went out, and some time in the evening I heard the noise of a horse's hoofs coming at a pretty fast gait. I began to study over my orders and the consequences if I shot, and the more I thought about it the more I resolved that if there was only one man approached I would not shoot him, but would capture him. He approached my post on a keen lope, and I let him get close enough so that I had a good bead on him, when I halted him with the usual salutation, "Who comes here?" He stopped very suddenly, but did not say a word. I waited a few minutes, and then demanded for the second time to know who he was and what he wanted. He in turn wanted to know who I was. I promptly informed him that that was my business and not his, and that unless he was very careful he was liable to have serious trouble, as I had a good squad of men handy. I again demanded that he dismount and advance, which he did, and when within about ten paces of me I halted him and said, "Now, tell me where you belong?" He said he was a union soldier. By that time Capt. Mayfield, who had heard the racket, appeared and I turned the man over to him, who sent him to Col. Post's quarters. The soldier told Col. Post that he was an officer on Gen. McCook's staff; that the hardest battle of the war had been fought that day, and that he was the seventh courier sent out and the first to get through. I have often thought of the consequences if I had killed him, as I had been ordered to do. The brigade, all of McCook's train, most of his artillery and ambulances, and Mitchell's cavalry train would have fallen into the hands of the rebels. As it was we marched immediately, reaching Crawfish Springs, Sunday, September 20, at ten o'clock a. m., and saved all this train, and then started it on the Dry Valley road to Chattanooga. We covered the retreat to Chattanooga."

He Stopped Very Suddenly.

Statue For Stanton.

The admirers of the late Edwin M. Stanton, attorney general in the cabinet of James Buchanan and secretary of war under Abraham Lincoln, are planning for the erection of a bronze statue of heroic size to his memory at Steubenville, O. Gen. Thomas T. Eckert, of New York city, who was assistant secretary of war under Stanton, has contributed liberally.

POLICIES CONFLICT

YOU CANNOT EAT YOUR CAKE AND HAVE IT TOO.

If Through Reciprocity, Tariff Concessions, Competitive Imports are Increased There Must Be an Equivalent Decrease of Domestic Production and Wage Paying.

For the ability displayed in the editorial columns of the Washington Post we have always had a great deal of respect. But the line must be drawn somewhere. For example:

"By reciprocity and truly protective duties we will protect our trade abroad as well as at home, and greatly enlarge our foreign markets."

Truly protective duties are duties that protect, are they not? Assuming an affirmative reply, we would like to learn from the Post how it is possible to maintain duties that truly protect and at the same time carry on a system of reciprocity in competing products. Duties that protect hold the domestic market for domestic labor and industry, do they not? If they do not do that, then they do not protect. If they do protect, then they do not and cannot invite and promote a larger inflow of commodities that compete with and displace their equivalent of domestic production and labor.

There can be no competitive reciprocity with duties that are truly protective. The duties that protect and the duties that increase our foreign trade in competing articles on the incoming side must of necessity be two entirely different sets of duties. They cannot be the same.

It is perfectly apparent that the truth of this maxim in economics is wholly ignored and disregarded by the free traders and tariff wreckers who dominate the National Association of Manufacturers. They may and probably do know that adequate protection for all domestic industry and free trade reciprocity in competing products cannot exist side by side. To them that fact is not material. Their purpose is to market abroad increased quantities of their manufactures—manufactures which, by reason of patents or patented processes, do not require tariff protection. They are not troubled by the consideration that their scheme of sacrificing protection for reciprocity would work disaster to many industries that do require protection.

They put it this way: "We know that reciprocity in competing products will hurt some industries while benefiting others; but the gain to those which are benefited will be greater than the loss to those which are injured." These words are quoted literally from a speech made in 1901 by an advocate of reciprocity at a national convention of manufacturers in Washington nearly six years ago.

It was very much as though the thief should say to the man whose pocket he had just picked: "I know you will feel somewhat the loss of this money, but its possession will do me far more good than its loss can do you harm." At least this seemed to be the convention's view of the ethical soundness of the proposition, for the reciprocity scheme was voted down at the rate of a hundred to one.

Confident that the Washington Post entertains no approving opinion of the policy of fattening some industries at the expense of other industries, we would in all sincerity be glad if the Post would tell us just how reciprocity in competing products and "truly protective duties" can possibly go hand in hand.

No; it will not do. What the foreigner wants and must have if he is to get more of his goods into the American market is a system of duties that do not truly protect. Any other duties—duties that do protect—will not do him a particle of good. To him that would mean bogus reciprocity, a confidence game, a gold brick. The foreign manufacturer is not a fool. He wants to get into this market, the best in the world, and he is going to do it if he can get enough American co-operation. Perhaps he will succeed. We do not know. But if he does succeed it will be because the American people want to do less of their own work and want more of it done by foreigners. In that event, don't let us talk any more about "truly protective duties." They will have gone out of fashion.

The "Real" Prosperity.

At the present time one cannot but pause and marvel at the unparalleled prosperity which now hovers over this progressive nation. Every industry throughout the country is flourishing as never before, and a "full dinner pail" confronts every tradesman and laborer who is willing to toil. From east to west and from north to south comes the demand for men; harvest time is at hand and some industries may suffer for lack of help. There is no excuse for a single idler in the United States under present conditions, neither has there been for some years past—but just now the field of opportunity is broader and better than ever. And the end is not yet; advancement is certain where confidence is so pronounced and general. The country is without a serf or a slave, and with plenty of work at good wages should inspire everyone with a desire, from a political standpoint, to leave well enough alone. Just now there is a dearth of political talk, but nevertheless, it is well to remember that invariably times are good while the Republican party holds in. And who would care to, or can truthfully deny it? Let's have no thought of going back to the dark period of a few years ago.—Wyoming Press.

Music.

I love the rhapsodies of God
That swell through fragrant dale and field.
I love the harmonies of space,
The music that the orbits yield.

At rest beside some monarch oak,
Where Nature's paens rise and roll,
The crooning of the rustling leaves
Is soothing incense to my soul.

I long to hear the gushing rill
That plays upon its water lute,
The chanting shells beside the sea,
The trilling of the mock-bird's flute.

From off across the lazy road,
That winds away where Peace is king,
I hear the frou-frou of the corn
In troubadour's soft murmuring.

Apollo's lute to me is sweet,
And honeyed as the tinkling bell
That fairies wave with rhythmic swing
Upon a bed of asphodel!

Ah, Liszt and Wagner, turn thine ear
To where the soul of tone is purled,
Where God has placed in Nature's sphere
The master music of the world!

Eddies.

At last a complete census of the stars has been taken. There are a hundred million orbs like the sun, all of which a man sees when he splits kindling wood under the clothes line.

Has your wife whispered in your ear, yet, that her last winter's coat should be replaced by a new seal skin? Not yet? Shh! Neither's mine! Don't wake 'em up!

When a man wins on the races, he tells his wife and she pretends to be horrified, but she takes the money and says, with a ripple of satisfaction in her voice, "You are luckier than you are good." When the man loses, however, she doesn't say a word—because he doesn't tell her.

A good villain has to be very bad.

A man who can own an automobile and a kodak and keep out of debt, is a financial wonder.

And now we have to stand by and see our friends raise winter whiskers!

A Texas man is said to have raised a number of melons as large as musk melons. Nobody hain't handed me one of 'em yet.

A Maryland man went away from home, left his door unlocked, and returning, found two sons-in-law. Fathers with large girl families, please take the hint.

The fun of seeing a man with side whiskers and a mustache, eating corn off the cob, is over for this season.

When politicians want to fool somebody, they tell the truth.

They Want Theirs.

The Columbus (Ind.) Republican says that out in Maple Grove a small boy has been circulating the following petition:

"To Our Respected Mothers:—Whereas, we, the undersigned sons of you, our various mothers, have been guilty of violating the various laws, rules and regulations laid down by you, inasmuch as we went in swimming in that part of the year commonly called Dog Days, we respectfully petition you, severally and individually, to remove that part of our clothing commonly known among us boys as pants, and to apply to us some instrument of torture, such as a gad, shingle, hair brush, buggy whip, slipper or cat-of-nine-tails, and to continue to apply said instrument of torture and punishment until we have been thoroughly chastised, and promise never to go swimming again.

Respectfully submitted."

Just Like a Hog.

Up at Postville, Ia., the baseball team used for its ground a hog pasture on the edge of town. Hog cholera broke out in the herd belonging to the farmer who owned the pasture and the health authorities prohibited the continuance of ball games, for fear the crowds gathering to see the ball games would spread the cholera all over the country. It was hard luck for the team, but they saw the good sense of the idea and quit cheerfully.—Exchange.

No Reason for Alarm.

A Kansas editor is guilty of the following: A couple were recently married. The ceremony over, the wife began to weep copiously. "What's the matter?" asked the new husband. "I never told you that I didn't know how to cook," sobbed the bride. "Don't fret," said he, "I'll not have anything to cook; I'm an editor."

More Trouble.

A report was current to-day that Charles Brick, the man with a broken back, who escaped from the Belmont county infirmary Monday night of last week, had been seen in Wheeling yesterday. He was able to walk with two canes and was accompanied by a woman. It is thought the man has been married again.

SING A NEW SONG FOR NEW YEAR.

Millions have been made to believe that every fortune has been stolen, that every corporation has been dishonestly managed, that every success has been due not to merit, but to fraud. And yet the great corporation managers are just as honest as the farmers, or the merchants, or the mechanics; the railroads are just as honestly managed as the newspapers which have denounced them, and beside the sins of the average political agitator their sins would appear as white is to black; the packing-houses are more cleanly than nine out of every ten farmers' dairies, the meats are safer and better than what half the farmers get from their own fields, for they are better handled; the oil that lubricates the machinery or that lights the lamps in the home of wealth or the home of poverty is as honestly made and sold as the produce from the average farmer; the banker instead of being a grinding money shark is doing his duty in the business world just as faithfully and conscientiously as the most honest statesman in the land. And the ministers who have left preaching the gospel of love in order to make a sensation by preaching a gospel of hate are not one whit more honest or God-fearing than many of the very men they denounce.

None of us is perfect—no, not one, but the average man is just about the same in faithfulness, in honesty, in a realization of responsibility, whether he be found in the great corporation, on the farm or in the shop. Most of us are trying to do right, and if we have faith in ourselves, faith in our own integrity, then we should have faith in our fellow-men. He who broadly questions the honesty of others by so doing casts a doubt upon his own. Let us, therefore, on the first business days of the new year, retrace our steps, let us eliminate the poison from our lives, and with grateful hearts for our abounding blessings sing with a new force and a meaning which we never knew before:

"On earth peace, to men good will."

THE IMMIGRATION QUESTION.

In a single year, the number of foreigners coming to America was fully equal to the entire population of West Virginia. Thoughtful citizens have for years looked with deep misgiving on this inundation of aliens, and increasing proportion of which show little tendency to assimilate itself to American citizenship. Nevertheless the greed of steamship companies, mining and manufacturing corporanions, and real estate boomers, aided by the yawp of sentimental goody-goodies, has caused the flood to increase year by year.

But there are now multiplving signs that our American people are becoming aroused on this matter and will insist that their civilization and their institutions shall not be put in hazard by hordes of foreign-speaking people who care little or nothing for them. They are also making haste to possess themselves of land before the diminishing opportunity to do so reaches the vanishing point. There are also signs that foreign labor is falling into disfavor. Even the corporations, which are most at fault for this excessive immigration, are coming to see that the foreigner is less efficient than the native.

People are asking themselves whether it is true patriotism to shove aside the native workman who spends all his dollars in his native land, and aims to live on a decent scale of comfort. They are all the more quick to ask this question when they behold unassimilating foreigners living in filth and draining our country of no inconsiderable amount of wealth through their practice of sending home a very great share of their earnings.

Sentimental foghorn blowers who ought to be sent to the chain gang have been telling us that Europe is overcrowded, that our country has room for all, and that it is the duty of America be a refuge for the poor and oppressed. Such speech is not patriotic. It is almost treasonable. Europe is very populous, yet it is not overcrowded snd never has been. Her governments are taking alarm at the drain on her laboring population, and are now showing an inclination to cooperate with us in restraining it. Much of this "overcrowding" tommyrot is due to the maladjustments of European society, and we cannot hope to see much reform in this direction so long as we provide a safety valve for the benefit of the nobility (?) of Europe. In government as in other things, charity should begin at home. Neither is our supply of land without limit. Far from it. Thanks to the land thieves and land speculators of the West, a land famine is already imminent, as any one may see who is aware of the dimensions or the tide of settlers into our Southwestern states.

The present restrictions on immigra- amounts to very little. The number of aliens admitted from any given country should be limited to a definite number each year, and not only should the passport test be rigidly applied at the port of entry, but no one should be admitted to naturalization who cannot pass as good a test of Americanism as the native himself.

How Much Could You Get For Your Farm?

You are a farmer. You live near this town. You own land. Let us say that you own more than you need and would like to sell a hundred acres.

How much could you get per acre?

Land values have risen lately. But has the value of your land risen as you think it should?

Your land is good land. You think it is worth considerably more than anybody has offered you. Well, let us see.

A man buying farm land naturally prefers to locate near a thriving, up to date town. He wants good home markets for his crops. He wants good schools.

Let us say your land is three miles from town. A farm that looks very much like yours is three miles from a town twice as big and twice as prosperous as this town.

If you were going to buy a farm for your own occupancy, wouldn't you pay a whole lot more for land near the town that is twice as large and twice as lively?

Of course you would. It would be good business.

Now, what makes a town big and bustling? Money. Money in circulation. Not in circulation in Chicago, for instance, but right in the town that wants to grow.

How much money have you sent to the big Mail Order houses in the city the past ten years? How much have your neighbors sent? How much have all of you together put out of circulation here at home?

It is probably beyond calculation. If all that money had been spent in your own home town, isn't it reasonable to assume that the town would have grown more than it has grown?

Wouldn't this town be a bigger and better town?

Wouldn't it have more stores to buy your produce?

Wouldn't it have more public improvements to make it more attractive to outsiders who might come here to live, to go into business, or buy your surplus land at a good figure?

TO TRADE AT HOME MEANS TO HELP THE TOWN AND THE NEIGHBORHOOD. TO HELP THE TOWN AND THE NEIGHBORHOOD MEANS TO HELP YOURSELF.

LIFE OF COUNTRY EDITOR NOT A LONG, SWEET SONG

He Has To Work Like A Galley Slave and His Troubles Are Numberless.

Gazing alternately at the slowly diminishing pile of copy before him and at the inexorable motion of the minute hand on the clock, the city newspaper worker has often sighed and murmured: "How I wish I had nothing to do but to get out a weekly newspaper in some small, retired, bucolic place where a weekly supplies all demands in the newspaper line. I could take things easy for six days and with just one day's work get out a far better issue than any I know of, and not have to watch the blame clock so closely. I'll make that boat someday, too, quit this strenuous game, and be a respected citizen in some community that appreciates my talents and needs a waking-up."

It is a wish that doubtless springs from the heart and there are few city newspaper men who, at some time or another, have not given expression to it. Yet, sad to relate, it is a wish that would probably not exist but for the stolid ignorance of those who entertain it.

They cherish the idea that a "country editor," as they call him, spends most of his time in the summer in a hammock, or fishing, and in the winter exchanging yarns with the frequenters of the corner store or sitting in an easy chair.

It seems rude and unfraternal to attribute ignorance on a subject to men who have the wide range of knowledge that subeditors and reporters in a metropolis must have in order to be competent for their work, but ample proof of the allegation exists in the delusion that the man who edits a "country weekly" has but one worry and that is "how to kill time."

The truth is that many of the scribes in the provinces are so over whelmed with work that they often have to fill up their editorial column (that sacred department labeled "Opinions for which the editor is alone responsible") with plate matter miscellany because a multitude of other duties has deprived them of the opportunity to search for and scissor some editorial in a city newspaper that agrees with their sentiments.

One must not get the impression that the editer starts the week with the deliberate intention of using plate matter in that sacred column which "Pro Bono Publico," "Veritas" and the rest of them would like to burden with their views, unreeled by the yard, but which the editor guards so jealousy. Not at all!

He begins with the intention of actually writing an editorial; perhaps as many as two. Then he modifies his design by resolving to "steal" one if he can find one that measures up to his standard, but the composing room has so much else to set up that he feels there is no hurry about it and he can be very choice in his selection.

Finally press time grows near and there is the alternative of running an editorial or getting an account of that party, with the name of a hundred persons in it, into type. The latter naturally has precedence and the plate matter again helps out in the emergency.

What a handy thing that plate matter is! How often in prevents the disaster of going to press with blank columns! There are indeed only two occasions in the country editor's life when he really fells uneasy—when the press breaks down and when the plate matter is "all."

In the latter contingency there is the horrible possibility of having to use the same stuff over again, and there are few editors whose consciences are so impaired that they will adopt this expedient with cold-blooded indifference.

For the benefit of those who do not know what plate matter is, it must be explained that it consists of thin strips of metal, with a type surface, bearing articles, jokes and useful information, good at any time, all ready for printing, so that all the country editor has to do to fill up when his typesetters (the use of the plural is Pickwickian) fail him, is to saw off a sufficient quantity of the proper length and lock up the form.

Some of them may not care a fig whether they saw between the first and last part of a sentence and leave the last part for the next issue, but such carelessness. Some newspapers even get their "telegraphic news" in plate matter by express.

In brief, plate matter is the chief consolation of a "country" newspaper office, an oasis in the desert, a lodge in a wilderness, a demijohn in a prohibition town, and a few other things like that.

Among the distractions that forbid the devotion of time to "opinions for which the editor is alone responsible" are callers having various errands. Some want to talk about advertisements, some tell where a news item is to be had and some apparently drop in talk about the weather.

It is not the part of policy to cut the latter short, for it may be that after boring the editor for about an hour, some of these callers will surprise him by paying back subscriptions or starting to "take the paper." Although there are a hundred and one other tasks besides the writing of the contemplated editorial on hand, the cautions editor must never neglect the opportunity to make himself solid with his subscribers and those whom he wishes to make subscribers.

It may be that some man, who thinks that it is incumbent upon him to discuss politics at length every time he drops in to get an extra copy of the paper, will some day have a "personal sale," involving the printing of large posters from wood type on the old-fashioned handpress that is still retained in many Maryland offices for such service.

The editor's first consideration is to find the wherewithal to get out his paper without going to bank and borrowing it. The "news" comes to him without solicitation, but he must exercise the patience of Job in his forays for cash. It is better to let an account run until the Orphans' Court settles the estate of the debtor than to charge it up to profit and loss. Nevertheless substantial reductions in the price are offerred for subscriptions "paid in advance," and to get these takes hustling.

These cares and worries are of course, unknown to the man who fills the copy basket in a city newspaper office, racing against tims as he does it. But they are the principal aggravations of that life which the deluded envy and believe to be a life to blissful ease.

While "the country editor" has no trouble to get the news, as above asserted, the news-gathering end of his business is not without its vexations. There are those who think that no better jokes can be devised that to get him to print something that has no foundation in fact, and who will exercise copious quantities of ingenuity in trying to make him the victim of a "fake," He must display April Fool's Day caution all the year around, until the idea that he is not one who can be imposed upon becomes firmly imbedded in the minds of the mischievous.

Again one of his great difficulties is to convince his corps of reporters (which practically embraces everybody past the age of infancy), that it is not "news" to wonder why Tom Jones drove over to a neighboring village, the home of Tom's sweetheart, on a certain night, or to say the in fence in front of the village miser's home needs a coat of paint.

It sometimes requires skill in navigation equal to that of the ancient mariner who sailed successfully between Scylla and Charybdis to meet the demands of those who want things put in the paper and of others who want the same things kept out. The editor must try, however, to keep "on the right side of" as many persons as he can, and he only puts his warpaint on when it cannot be helped. It is an expensive luxury.

To him all citizens are highly respected and influential, providing they have kept out of jail and off the ticket of the opposition party. They are "esteemed," "consistent in convictions," "progressive" and "charitable" when occasion requires it as certainly as they are "well known" under all circumstances.

An exception is the rival editor. He is always a "vile wretch," if not an out-and-out "scoundrel," and is always deserving of "withering contempt," which is unspairingly poured on his devoted head.

There are those who are amazed at the bitter acrimony displayed in crossfire between rival scribes, who otherwise seem as gentle as lambs. But there is no cause for amazement.

The opposition editor is the only victim upon whom skill in invective may be exercised with comparative impunity.

There is no danger of losing a subscriber in "giving it to him hot." All the pent-up fury generated by an accumulation of vexations, borne in submissive silence, finds its outlet in fulminations against the scribber across the way. These safety-valve emissions prevent an explosion that might do actual damage.

Many editors go into a duel of this kind, feeling little of the sourness of disposition that they seem to display, believing that they are expected to hold up their end in the wordy warfare, and regarding the combat as a time-honored institution and objurgatory frolic. Others, however, believe in every caustic sentence that they pen, and are chagrined because the community does not arise in its indignation and run the other fellow out of town.

These picturesque diversions in the monotony of the life of the "country editor" are becoming less frequent than of yore. He spends most of his time making records of "the harvest of the Grim Reaper," recorded accessions to the ranks of "charming brides," and all that goes on in his neighborhood, and scissoring articles of extraordinary importance for reproduction but they must be extraordinary to be deemed worthy of notice.

To him the slaughter of the champion-weight hog of the county is more momentous than the fall of the greatest city in the course of a foreign war. He finds plenty of variety in his labors by reason of the various schemes he has to employ to get money to pay his paper bill, his modest pay roll, and keep up to date with his machinery.

He does many chores around the office which the office boy has neglected, if there is such a luxury as an office boy, or which the foreman has put off until some less strenuous day, if there is a foreman. And last but not least, he reads proofs.

Reading proofs probably does not enter into the calculations of those who regard the life of the "country editor" as a "primrose path of dalliance." That labor is accomplished in the cities by men who have nothing else to do. They constitute a profession apart, and their wonderful expertness is attested by the infrequency of errors in a city newspaper. Many a time the "star" reporter and experienced editor have to thank the proofreader for catching some misstatement in a manner that would do credit to Sherlock Holmes.

The "country editor" has no such kind, protecting friend. In the midst of his other duties he is called upon to correct a blurred and indistinct proof of an item intended to inform his readers that "stormy weather kept many from the picnic" and he makes a score of marks thereon. But he finds out after the paper has gone to press that it contains the remarkable declaration: "Stormy mother kept Mary from the picnic." and naturally concludes that proof-reading is not the least among his troubles.

"The "country editor" has to read proofs of advertisements and "job work" as well as those of news items, and it is no wonder that he sometimes envies the village doctor, who can "bury his mistakes."

The following is a copy of a recently printed tale of woe and typographical perversity:

"Last week we printed a large sale bill for Mr.———. Although the cost of the bill was only a few dollars, we feel confident that Mr.——— got $50 worth of good advertising out of the bill alone. There wasn't an eye of a single individual in the two districts that don't see the bill. Why? We had two mistakes on it. The first man that saw it thought his mission on earth was not completed until his neighbor saw it. Thus it spread from father unto the third and fourth generation."

When the "country editor" has learned to wrestle with and overcome all these problems, without the quiver of an eyelash or the risk of nervous prostration; has become known as the publisher of a journal that is neat, clean and creditable, and has increased his circulation to the uttermost, he often finds that if he wishes to have enough money to put coal in his bin and eggs on his breakfast table he must devise means to supplement his income.

There are a few fortunate individuals who are exceptions to this rule, but the majority of those who control the destinies of weekly newspapers are compelled to combine with their editorial duties some other method of alluring the nimble dollar.

Perhaps the favorite method in Maryland is that of practicing law. There are also preacher-editors, who conduct telegraph offices, who hold public office, editors who sell something on commission, perhaps even some who have fallen so low as to become agents.

There is one man in Western Maryland who conducts a weekly newspaper of the sprightly variety, who always finds time to furnish sage homilies instead of plate matter for his editorial column, who never carries important news over a week because he has not had time to write it, but who is also a druggist, a lawyer, a real estate agent and an insurance agent.

There are others who run him a close second, but enough has been said to show that the "country editor," while he may be a Poobah, is not a Sybarite.

B. & O. RETRENCHED.

At Cumberland, Md., Clerks Laid Off.

Since the beginning of the new year the policy of retrenchment has become quite effective and the B. & O. employes in this city says the Cumberland News. Particularly is this true among the clerks in the yard, transportation and maintenance of way department. There has been general shake-up among the yard employes, a number of chalkers and several clerks being laid off, or assigned to other duties. In other departments in this city several clerks have been laid off or dispensed with altogether. It is also asserted that several freight handlers will be put off at the warehouse here.

The policy of retrenchment on the B. &. O. may continue for some weeks to come. There was those who seem to think that the resignation of Mr. Fitzgerald has something to do with some of the clerks and yard men losing their places. But those who have watched the policy of the B. & O. for years see nothing new in the retrenchment policy. The B. & O. has retrenched before and has kept on retrenching until every department became so piled up with work undone that reaction was imperative. It was so under Fitzgerald, it was so under his predecessors and itwill probably be so under his successors whoever he or they may be.

Rainbow at Noon.

People at home to dinner, returning to work from south to north shortly after noon Saturday of last week, saw a brilliant rainbow almost due north of town—a rare occurrence. The poets write of the rainbow as "the mild arch of promise on the evening sky," and as "hung on the shower that fronts the golden west," but seldom, if ever, of the one which illuminates the dark or spans the icebergs of the frozen north. No one knows the elemental significance of the event, if any, but a rainbow at any hour of sun-lit rain should be accepted as characteristically a token of good.—Frostburg Journal.

Strange ideas of missionary work these school marms have.

Mail for former patrons of that office is now delivered from the Oakland postoffice by rural carriers. Mrs. Knauer who conducted a store in connection with the postoffice, will continue the mercantile business at the same stand.

Reading, writing and spelling, we say it regretfully—are no longer thoroughly taught in the schools of the land. Young men and women who seek instruction in telegraphy, stenography and typewriting, although of good ability and general information are lamentably deficient in the fundamentals of the English language. They especially can not spell. Out of thirty or forty words in ordinary use sometimes one-half, or even two-thirds are misspelled. This every newspaper man will stand ready to vouch for from experience. The schools no longer give the common rudiments the attention they should—too much attention is given the higher branches before the common ones have been mastered. Especially do they neglect reading. Girls and boys attending the common schools should be thoroughly drilled in reading aloud, to develop the use of their vocal organs not only in reading but in spelling and reciting. Young ladies and young men, you should pay more attention to the common rudiments.

Among the young men attending school elsewhere who spent the holidays in Oakland and who have returned to their studies are Messrs. W. W. Grant, Frank Weber, of Oakland, and Henry Grusendorf, of Hutton, to Maryland University; Edward Sollars to Baltimore Medical College; Edmund Manges and Edward and Milton Sincell, Gettysburg College; Harry McComas, to Mercersburg Academy; Ralph Thayer and Paul Naylor, to Morgantown University.

Let us rally around the standard of youth, remembering that the future of our country shall be what the young people make it. Let us show our fathers and mothers that the boys and girls of today shall be ready to stand forth fully equipped men and women of tomorrow. Let us show them the rising generation which is following in their footsteps is fully competent to succeed them and shoulder the responsibility of the farm, the home and the nation.

The handsome features of our fellow-townsman, Fred. T. Martin, adorn the front page of the Fairmont Times this morning. This distinction was brought about by the prominence Fred has gained by nominating Governor Johnson, of Minnesota, for president on the Democratic ticket. Should the "Peerless One" be nominated, which he will be, and elected, which he will not be, of course, the big Taylor county statesmen would never have a seat in the cabinet of the Nebraska colonel.—Grafton Sentinel.

A tickling cough, from any cause, is quickly stopped by Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure. And it is so thoroughly harmless and safe, that Dr. Shoop tells mothers everywhere to give it without hesitation even to very young babes. The wholesome green leaves and tender stems of a lung-healing mountainous shrub, furnish the curative properties to Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure. It calms the cough, and heals the sore and sensitive bronchial membranes, no chloroform, nothing harsh used to injure or suppress. Simply a resinous plant extract, that helps to heal aching lungs. The Spaniards call this shrub which the Doctor uses, "The Sacred Herb." Always demand Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure.

Winter, with about two feet of snow, descended upon this whole section of the country, extending as far east as Washington and to the Ohio river on the West, Tuesday morning about daybreak. In Oakland the snow came down as though it had never snowed before, sixteen inches of the beautiful having fallen from daylight until early in the afternoon. Trains running through Oakland had considerable difficulty in getting through the snow drifts, especially in the cuts, locomotives equipped with snow plows being constantly run from east to west in order to keep the road open.

Ex-County Commissioner Jacob Stump, of Bloomington, who was recently appointed postmaster at Bloomington, this county, and who will take charge of the office as soon as his commission arrives from the Department at Washington, was in Oakland on business Monday and made this office a brief visit. Mr. Stump, as postmaster, succeeds Mrs. Fannie Bartlett, who has held the office for the period of seventeen years, having resigned therefrom some time during the past summer, but her resignation was not considered by the Department until in December, Mr. Stump having been appointed on the 30th of that month.

The Sunday afternoon lectures on the International Sunday School Lesson being delivered every Sunday at the rooms of the Young Men's Club by Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord, are exceedingly well attended by the young men of Oakland and freqently strangers who stop in Oakland over Sunday are among the speaker's auditors. Mr. Peddicord's talks upon the subjects are edifying and the greatness and goodness of the Bible characters treated in the Sunday School lessons are elaborated by the speaker to much greater length than is done in the lesson books. These Sunday afternoon talks may be continued during the summer months.

Located Body of Brother in Dream.

Mine No. 8, at Monongah, has given up another one of its dead in the person of David Riggins, one of the best known miners of that section of the state. He was found in the exact spot where his brother, George, the night previous dreamed he was lying dead.

For three consecutive nights George Riggins, who is an electrician in the mines of the region, dreamed of his lost brother and had presentiments as to where his body would be found. On awakening Monday he started to this remote section of the mine accompanied by a friend, and the body was found.

The body was badly decomposed but was fully identified by the clothing. His funeral was held Tuesday and was largely attended. This makes the total number of dead taken from the mine 353.

REV. LEE ARRIVED AT CALCUTTA

With His Assistants On November 14th Last.

From the India Messenger, of November 21st, published at Calcutta, India, the following, relative to Rev. D. H. Lee, of Mountain Lake Park, is clipped:

The arrival of the Rev. D. H. Lee and party of missionaries in Calcuttn a week ago and the reception accorded them the same evening proved to be an event of much more than ordinary interest. A large party of missionaries greeted them upon the arrival of their ship in the morning, and still more, joined by representatives of the various Missions in the city and of the church, greeted them in the drawing-room of the Calcutta Girls' School in the evening. That Mr. and Mrs. Lee should have left India fifteen months before on a desperate chance for saving her life any that they should return restored in health, buoyant in spirit and confident for the future, bringing five additional workers, whom they found in America during the last few months, and also their support, so that their coming in a party of seven missionaries at once for one work is a unique event in the history of the Bengal Conferenca, is remarkable indeed. It is a marked instance of the strange leading of providence. With the two young ladies, Miss Eddy and Miss Cooper who have so bravely and ably taken care of a large part of the work of the Mission during the absence of the principals and the two boys, there gather about the table in the Lee home the same number there would have been had their original family circle remained unbroken. They feel that God has answered prayer and the people have been kind in giving workers and support. Those who look on and understand feel that God has been rewarding whole-hearted loyalty and devotion, and the people at home have responded to direct personal, earnest, definite appeal. May the Lees be long spared for the work they love and their assistants, those who have seen service and those who have just come, be greatly used of God for India.

The circumstances attending the coming to the mission field of Miss Kinzley, one of the recruits for the Lee Memorial Mission, are worth noting. She was a member of a little company of people less than 100, who constituted a church in New England. They were without a pastor, but they prayed for one and looked for his coming. A smaller circle of thirteen united to pray for missions, and that they might as a church send a representative abroad even before they secured a pastor for themselves. Soon conviction fell on some, that they must be willing to go if they prayed that God would send some one; and a few gave up praying because they were not ready to go. Others persisted, and Miss Kinzley was the first to be chosed, an honour she greatly appreciates. She now represents her church in the foreign field. Surely God will prosper spiritually such a church as that. Should all the churches in America equally able, be equally loyal all the missionaries and their support for the evangelization of the world in a generation would be on the field in five years.

NEW MAP OF MARYLAND.

Geological Survey Gives Result Of Topographical Work.

The Maryland Geological Survey, under the direction of the State geologist, Prof. William Bullock Clark, is issuing a large map of Maryland, which will be one of the most accurate and complete maps ever issued for this territory.

In co-operation with the United States Geological Survey the State organization has completed the large portion of a topographical survey of the State. The results have been brought out in parts during the progress of the work in the form of maps on the scale of one mile to the inch. The parts have been issued by the Federal Government in quadrangles adapted to their general system, while the State survey has published its results by counties, 14 of the counties having already had such maps published to cover their area. Each country will ultimately have maps on this scale showing the topography and election districts, the geological formations, the agricultural soils and the forestry.

The new map just issued by the State Geological Survey contains much of the information of these larger scaled detailed maps. By means of mechanical processes it has been possible to retain practically all the accuracy and detail of the road system of the State. The new map indicates the general direction and minor turns in all the important roads of the State so that a traveler may trace his course from point to point with a feeling of assurance that his choice of roads has been correct.

The political boundaries within the limits of the State are represented in two ways. The larger divisions, such as counties, are distinguished by different colors and their limits are accurately represented by heavy black lines. The smaller divisions, such as election districts, which are subject to more or lees frequent change, are outlined and named in red.

The preparation of this map has involved a large amount of compilation, and its reduction to cartographic form has been under the editorial supervision of Prof. Edward B. Mathews, assistant State geologist. The map is published in three sheets, each 28 inches wide and 48 inches high. The western sheet includes Garrett and Allegany counties and Washington county as far east as Cherry Run. The central sheet includes the rest of Washington county, Frederick, Carroll, Baltimore, Howard, Montgomery, Prince George's, Anne Arundel, Calvert, Charles and St. Mary's counties. The eastern sheet includes the Eastern Shore and the Cheasepeake bay and represents Harford, Cecil, Kent, Talbot, Queen Anne's, Caroline, Dorchester, Wicomico, Somerset and Worcester counties and an outline map of Delaware. The three sheets will form a wall map more than four feet high and seven feet wide. It is the first reliable wall map of the State, based on actual surveys, which has been issued since the days of the well-known Martenet map. The new work is larger than the old, more accurate and up to date.

FIKE.

This is fine weather for winter, but no snow at present.

There are a number of people that are sick around here at this writing.

Mr. Isaac Frazee has a son and he feels so proud that all he can do is to stay in the house to look at the baby.

Mr. Owen Evans has his new house completed and has already moved in to it.

Wm. L. Thomas was very sick last week so that he was unable to return to his school until Sunday.

The Connecting Telephone Co., met at Markleysburg, Pa., last Thursday and settled up their old accounts and elected new officers.

Messrs. F. J. Bowser and Wm. L. Fike were working a couple of days for Wm. H. Thomas last week.

The school at this place has now an enrollment of 19 scholars and the teacher is doing her duty.

There is a protracted meeting in progress at this place now and there has been three converted all ready. We hope there will be many more to follow.

Wm. H. Thomas is getting a new sled so as to be ready to haul lumber and lime stone.

There are some of the girls around here could hardly wait till leap year for some have availed themselues of the opportunity already to go and see some young men.

Work is scarce around here at this time.

Scientists to Study Deep Well.

A recent issue of the Washington Post contained the following relative to the well of the Yough River Oil and Gas Company, located on the farm of Mr. John Harned, five miles west of Oakland, near Hutton, which will be read with much interest by many Oakland and Garrett county people generally:

"Smithsonian grant has been approved by Secretary Walcott in favor of Prof. William Hallock, of Columbia University, New York, to investigate a 3,300-feet well near Oakland, Md. Among other things, Dr. Hallock will determine, if possible, the conductivity of gas at that depth, and will try to get information as to the possible radioactivity of rock far below the surface of the earth."

The Shingle Blocker's Joke.

By CHARLES SLOAN REID.

Copyright, 1907, by Charles S. Reid.

THE gleam of a pink frock far down the side of the mountain had caught Tom Awtry's eye, and he released the handle of the drag saw and sat down upon the log he was cutting. The sun showed little mercy to the shingle blocker, and Tom threw open his shirt front to invite the coolness of the breeze. His thoughts were pleasant, and they had been in that state for the past two weeks, ever since Tilly Martin had promised to become his wife. He now looked upon the old cabin with disgust. It was unfit for Tilly's occupancy. There must be a new one, and some good American dollars must be turned out of the shingle blocks before the thing could be accomplished. Under these circumstances time was precious, and the growth of the heap of sawdust at Tom's feet had a wonderful value to his eyes. But the sight of that pink frock among the laurel leaves down there along the stream brought to him the temptation to lose at least one half hour out of the morning's work.

Tilly was fishing, and with some success, for she was intensely interested and never once turned her face toward the side of the mountain above her where the shingle blocker was at work.

Tom got up from the log and strode off toward the stream. The pink frock had remained motionless for some time, and Tom knew the fish were biting. When within a dozen steps of the bank of the stream a smile of mischief passed his lips, and he turned his swinging gait into a creeping step and moved stealthily forward until he was just behind Tilly, where she stood watching the bobbing of the line. Tom caught her by the arm, lifted her clear of the bank and dangled her form out over the water. Then there was a scream of fright that echoed down the gorge for a mile and started the pheasants from their hiding places among the undergrowth. But the scream had hardly escaped her lips when she was drawn back again and into the embrace of Tom, and the echo of his laughter followed that of the scream.

But when the moment of surprise had passed and Tilly had glanced up into Tom's face her cheeks went from the white light of fear to the danger signal of anger, and she broke from his arms and stood at bay against the trunk of a poplar. Her bosom rose and fell tumultuously, while two tears glistened in her eyes. Tom took a step backward and allowed his chin to rest on his breast, crushed by the reproach of Tilly's eyes.

"Tilly, I—I—are ye mad with me?"

Tilly caught her lower lip between her teeth and remained silent, her fingers working nervously.

"For heaven's sake, Tilly, tell me ye ain't mad, so I can look up again!"

But nothing came from Tilly save the sound of her still labored breathing. Tom's head remained bowed, and he waited a moment. The waters of the stream swished against the rocks, but the music of it did not at that moment appeal to the shingle blocker.

"Tilly! Oh, Tilly!"

The cry came from the depths of his soul, and the tone of it seemed of cavernous origin. But there was only silence for an answer, and it cut into his heart like an edged tool. If he had taken a moment to consider how frightened she would be, this awful situation might have been avoided. But it was too late to think of that now. A weakness seized Tom's limbs, and, with head still bowed, he sank to his knees, with his hands outstretched imploringly.

"Tilly!"

His voice was weaker, and the sadness of his tone was surely enough to declare the fullness of his repentance.

"Tilly, ye're too pure an' sweet, an' yer heart's too good for ye not to forgive me."

But the unshed tears still glistened in Tilly's eyes, her cheeks still glowed with the red fire of her vexation, her heart still stormed in her bosom, and she made no answer.

"An' ye won't forgive me, Tilly?"

This time he had raised his eyes toward hers and waited. Under his gaze the two unshed tears slipped from the girl's eyes and hung upon her cheeks, and her white teeth released the quivering lower lip.

"I—I'll never forgive ye, Tom Awtry. So there! An' don't ye ever speak to me again!"

Catching up her apron, Tilly wiped the tears from her cheeks and turned quickly into the trail that led along the edge of the stream. Tom stood motionless and stared after her until the last vestige of the pink frock was hurled from view among the interminable green of the laurel's foliage. Then, with his hat in his hand, he turned back up the hill toward his work. Slowly he went. The slow machinery of his brain was trying to bring out a clear realization of all that had happened. A choking sensation was struggling for a grip of his windpipe, and he tore away his shirt collar well down upon his shoulders. The plans for the new cabin now mocked him in his thoughts, and scattered to the winds was all the promised happiness of a lifetime, and all this for a little prank of mischief.

Meanwhile Tilly had wandered from the laurel path and had climbed a bowlder whence she could look back over the bluff, and she watched Tom climbing the mountain. Her anger was passing away, and already she regretted her impulsive speech. But it was now too late to recall it.

"Poor Tom!" she murmured, shading her eyes and peering through the timber. "Oh, he's so big an' strong! I'm just like a child in his hands. An' an' even if he had dropped me into the water it would not have been anything but a wettin' for me—an' I have gone an' played such a fool! Poor Tom!"

She sat down on the rock and covered her face with her apron.

"An' I told him never to speak to me again. I wonder if he will think I meant it sure 'nough."

A deep, audible sob came now, and Tilly's small body swayed from side to side. Presently her ears caught the swish of the drag saw far up the mountain, and she knew Tom had gone back to work.

Swish, swish, swish, swish!

Tilly sat for an hour and listened. There was never a pause except for the few seconds required to change the saw for a new cut. At last the dinner horn sounded from over the stream, and Tilly went home. In the afternoon she came back to the bowlder to listen to the sound of Tom's saw.

Swish, swish, swish, swish, interminably.

Tom stopped no more to rest, as he had been wont to do occasionally. There was a fierceness in the stroke and a rapidity of motion that accomplished wonders. It was work, work now, no matter what the muscles suffered.

Swish, swish, swish, swish!

Tilly sat and listened through the whole afternoon. Oh, would he never stop one minute to rest his tired arms? At last the sun sank below the crown of the mountain, and when the shadow of night fell upon Tilly she drew a long breath of relief. But not until the last moment of the twilight was spent did the sound of the drag saw cease.

Tilly crept home again, picking her way along the trail that led through the laurel.

An hour later the moon rose, and its white light outlined many a weird shadow on the rocks. Tilly stole out of the cabin and sat upon the low veranda in front of the house. A terrible feeling of loneliness came over her. Tom had been coming almost every night to sit for an hour with her, to tell her every few minutes how much he loved her, to toy with her fingers and occasionally touch his lips to her forehead. Now he would not come. He would never come again. Maybe he would go away soon—out west, somewhere. A moan of intense heartsickness escaped Tilly's lips, and she looked toward the moon for pity. Then presently a sound came to her ears from far away over the stream. It was faint, but clear.

Swish, swish, swish, swish!

Tilly bowed her face in her hands, and the tears scalded her fingers as they fell from her eyes.

Swish, swish, swish, swish!

How the faint and faraway sound cut upon her ears! After awhile a man came to the door of the cabin from the inside.

"Tilly, what air ye settin' out here so late about?" He looked down upon the girl from the doorway.

"Nothin', dad," was the answer.

"Nothin'? Well, then, I'd shore go to bed. Hello, what's that?"

Swish, swish, swish, swish!

"Dinged if Tom Awtry ain't a-cuttin' shingle blocks by moonlight. Means to build that new cabin purty soon, I reckon, Tilly."

Tilly struggled to suppress the sob that rose in her throat.

"Well, Tom's not comin' here tonight, gal," said the man, "so ye'd as well go to bed."

"I'm goin' in a minute."

Tilly's minute lasted an hour, and the sound of the drag saw had not ceased when she went to bed. Late in the night, sleepless, she crept to the window, thrust her head out through the opening and listened.

Swish, swish, swish, swish!

The sound smote upon her sense with sickening clearness, and she sank to her knees, dropping her head upon the window sill. A little later she went to sleep in this position and did not wake until the first peep of dawn.

The day passed, and another and another, and Tilly's misery deepened with the dawn of each succeeding one, and especially since she could see from her place on the bowlder the growing weakness of the man who loved her. At so great a distance even she could see that he had grown pale, and once or twice she had seen him stumble over trifles and catch at the saw frame for support. Saturday came, and Tilly welcomed the day. The next day would be Sunday and Tom must rest.

But late in the afternoon of Saturday the drag saw stopped. Tom had sunk away from the handle and fallen to his knees. From the bowlder Tilly saw this and started forward. Then she stopped and retraced her steps, though for a moment she covered her eyes with her hands. When she looked again Tom was creeping and stumbling toward the cabin a hundred yards away from where he had been at work. Tilly watched him until the door was closed behind him; then she plunged into the laurel and sped along the trail toward home.

Sunday she went a number of times to the bowlder, whence she could see Tom's cabin, but not once was the door opened during the day. Monday the drag saw stood idle where the shingle blocker had left it. And now a new source of uneasiness came to Tilly. The silent, deserted look of Tom's cabin filled her with fear. It was not that she feared Tom had gone away. The unfinished work, the half cut shingle block and the disorder of things told her that he had not gone. Tom was ill—or—Tilly clutched at her temples to stay the throbbing. No, Tom could not be dead.

Tuesday Tilly crept through the laurel, passed the base of the bowlder and went on slowly, but unhesitatingly, up the side of the mountain toward the cabin where Tom lived alone.

As she neared the cabin she quickened her step. Had she waited too long? Oh, if Tom would only speak to her when she rapped at the door! She stood a full minute with her small knuckles poised to strike the rough boards. Her heart beat tumultuously and her knees grew weak as she thought of what might have happened in that cabin.

At last the knuckles fell upon the board, and a faint, hollow tattoo echoed from the interior. But no other sound came in answer. A terrible sense of horror fell upon Tilly, and a quick fever parched her lips and tongue. Then suddenly her knuckles beat a long nervous rattle upon the door, and, bowing her head against the board, she moaned:

"Oh, Tom!"

A moment elapsed, then—

"Tilly, Tilly!" came faintly from under the door.

With an exuberant joy Tilly reached for the latchstring, and the door swung inward. On the floor, with his head near the doorway, lay Tom. His face was sunken and sallow, and his eyes seemed far back in his head. Tilly clasped her hands and stood looking down upon him, that sickness of soul which had characterized her feelings for the last week again coming upon her.

"Tom, ye've been lyin' here since Saturday, ain't ye?"

Tilly dropped by his side and took one of his hands in hers.

"An' it's all my fault, Tom. I heard yer saw goin' day an' night an' never stoppin', an' I was 'feared it was comin' to this."

"No, Tilly; it was all my fault. I—I didn't think it would scare ye so. An' arter what I'd done an' ye would not forgive me an' told me never to speak to ye again I had to work hard to keep from thinkin' about it all. Do ye forgive me now, Tilly?"

Tilly raised Tom's head on her arm and laid her cool fingers upon his brow.

"I forgive ye afore I got home, Tom, but I didn't want to go back an' tell ye. An'—an', Tom, if ye knowed how I been feelin' about it ever since I reckon ye'd forgive me."

"Forgive ye, Tilly? It's like—like takin' a peep into paradise to have ye back again. An' now when I get a leetle stronger we'll have that new cabin."

"Never mind the new cabin, Tom. The old one is good enough for the likes o' me. An' now I'm goin' to help ye to bed an' get ye somethin' to eat."

"I'm a lot better now, Tilly. I jest had a dizziness somehow. But I'm set on havin' the new cabin."

"Well, then, we'll have it, an' I'll dress every log ye touch."

Tilly kissed him. And just then the sun, coming from behind a cloud, threw its warm glow through the doorway and across the cabin floor.

ECHOES FROM RELIGIOUS FIELDS

CHRISTIAN WORKER HONORED.

Head of the Ragged School Union, of London, Knighted.

When some strenuous worker in the field of philanthropy is suddenly "commanded" to visit the king of England, in order to receive royal recognition of the worth of self-sacrificing effort for humanity, all the nation awakes to pay homage to the person thus honored. The latest instance of this kind is the knighting of Mr. John Kirk, who recently completed 40 years' unceasing endeavor to ameliorate the lot of the unfortunate slum children of London. King Edward conferred on Mr. Kirk the rank and title of Knighthood, so that he will henceforth be known as Sir John Kirk, while his wife will be Lady Kirk. This titular rank is not hereditary.

SIR JOHN KIRK.

Mr. Kirk has become famous as the secretary of the Ragged School union. After years of marvelous devotion, honors are now crowding upon him. At the London Mansion House he has been presented by the Marquis of Northampton with a portrait of himself, painted by William Rainey, together with other handsome gifts subscribed for throughout the United Kingdom. The Lord Mayor of London, Sir William Treloar, arranged a special gathering of distinguished men to meet the man who has won such widespread esteem.

Sir William Treloar is himself a philanthropist in the same field in which Mr. Kirk has labored. He is known and loved as the "Crippled Children's Lord Mayor," on account of his munificent gifts through long years for the benefit of the most forlorn class of city juveniles. Surely, remarks the Christian Herald, this deserves to be called "The Golden Era for Childhood." Education and philanthropy combine to give opportunities to childhood unthought of till now.

CHINA MOVING.

Evidences of the Empire's Coming to the Light.

The officials of the Chinese empire are surely seeking light from the missionaries. As an evidence of this fact, recently the governors or treasurers of five provinces, representing a population of 100,000,000 people, ordered 3,800 copies of the "Chinese Recorder," which is one of the papers edited by the missionaries in Shanghai. The literati are rapidly coming to the conclusion that western education is superior to that of their own country. Naturally they associate western learning and Christianity, because the missionary enterprise has always been allied with the western educational propaganda. Last week in the city of Calgi, the two highest Chinese officials in the city, in the presence of a large staff of literary men, urged the representatives of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions to send more missionaries there.

That Christianity is making rapid progress in China is evidenced by the following statistics:

Industrial Y. M. C. A.

The first Industrial Y. M. C. A. on the Pacific coast has been organized at Roslyn, a coal mining town of 5,000 people in Washington. The Northwest Improvement company (a subsidiary company of the Northern Pacific Railway company), gives largely to its support, and over 300 men have pledged membership.

To Give Health Talks.

Every week for three months the Y. M. C. A. at Scranton, Pa., has arranged to give the employes of the big shops a practical health talk at noon. Leading physicians have told men how to live a healthy life. These talks have been conducted by the physical director, C. R. H. Jackson.

"Gypsy" Smith to Come Again.

"Gypsy" Smith, the famous evangelist from London, now touring this country, has met with such great success of late in his missions, that he has accepted an invitation to come to the United States again, probably in two years, and conduct another evangelistic campaign.

Scattering the Good Seed.

The report showing work of the American Tract society during its eighty-second year shows that during that period 30,000,024 copies of its periodicals have been issued.

Celebrate 450th Anniversary.

The 450th anniversary of the Moravian church was recently celebrated. The church is this country has about 16,000 members.

TEMPERANCE

AGAINST KING ALCOHOL.

How Physicians Are Acting as Temperance Reformers.

The North Carolina state board of medical examiners has recently decided to withdraw the license to practice medicine in that state of any physician whose addiction to alcohol or drugs has unfitted him to properly practice. The circuit court of Nebraska also, has lately sustained the state board of health in a like measure in its power to de-license physicians failing to properly perform their duty from this cause.

Dr. T. D. Crothers, superintendent of the Walnut Lodge hospital, Hartford, Conn., notes the above facts in his "Journal of Inebriety," and goes on to say:

"Every physician should be a temperance reformer in the broad sense, and a teacher and leader in the study of these problems in every community. Inebriety from alcohol and the sale of spirits as a beverage, is a sanitary problem of enormous proportions, which the medical man of all others is trained to study.

"The medical man who would be indifferent to diphtheria, yellow fever or any other contagious disease, and assume an attitude of indifference to efforts to prevent these diseases, would merit the severest condemnation. There is no disease of evil whose entailment of physical suffering and mortality is so great, and so intimately related to the home of every community, as the alcohol problem. There is no physical condition so influential in the growth and life of civilization which a medical man is so well trained to understand and to prevent.

"The medical man of all others, should be a total abstainer, and a temperance man in the broadest meaning of this term, one whose personal life and conduct approximates and sustains his work and teaching. Of all men, physicians should be the leaders in temperance work, to understand the evils which follow from alcohol, and point out their destructive influence, and the means of prevention and cure."

Dr. Crothers further supplements his own views on the subject by similar statements of eminent European specialists, and in conclusion, expresses confidence that the final solution of the alcoholic problem will be achieved when the profession take it up as a purely medical subject.

Can't Use the Flag.

Liquor dealers in Nebraska took it into their heads that they would sell more beer by having the beer bottles decorated with the national colors, and they did it. Some Nebraska patriots took the matter into court, and, finally, after a strenuous battle, it was decided in the supreme court of the state that the liquor interests had no case, and the use of the Stars and Stripes for advertising purposes was illegal. The case was appealed to the supreme court of the United States, and the ruling of the Nebraska courts was sustained. "Old Glory" has been saved from sacrilege, and the flag of freedom will not be defiled by vulgar associations.

Vote "No Saloons."

Seven years ago, Long Beach, a popular ocean resort in southern California, voted out all saloons. It was then a village of 3,000. To-day it is a city of 18,000. When a recent tourists' palace hotel was erected, bar privileges were asked for. The people have just decided the point by voting "No," two to one, stating that under license their bank deposits were $140,000, whereas to-day they are $5,000,000, that the city's class of citizens and its prosperity are due to no saloons and tourists who must have liquor are not needed.—Ex.

Hard Times for Liquor Business.

Mida's Criterion, a wholesale liquor organ, states that the wholesale liquor dealers and jobbers throughout the country find that business has slackened up materially since the beginning of the year. The greatest contributory cause of the lull is, they believe, the apprehension regarding the inimical legislation now pending in nearly every state in the union.

Drink and Crime.

The recently issued statistics for Great Britain for 1905 show that for England and Wales the non-indictable offenses tried summarily were 729,727. Of these nearly one-third (219,276) were for drunkenness. Drunkenness also accounted for between a third and one-half of the whole number received into prison.

The Business It Hurts.

"It is one of the most ridiculous things in one's experience when some fellow shouts out that shutting up a whisky shop on Sunday 'hurts business.' It may hurt the saloon business. That's all."—Ohio State Journal.

Cold Beer.

A German sanitary expert points out that the reason why beer is sold at a temperature so low as to be injurious to the stomach is that at that temperature it is difficult to tell stale beer from good beer.

Too Mean.

Many a man who comes home with a skate on is too mean to give his children a chance to sport on rollers.

A Comparison.

"Some years ago, I used

Davis' 100 per cent Pure Paint

on my home, at the same time, several other houses near me were painted with other paints. There is a big contrast today between the appearance of my house and others."

If you compare adulterated paint with Davis 100 per cent Pure, you will readily know why my house painted with Davis looks well and wears well.

Enlarging Your Business

If you are in business and you want to make more money you will read every word we have to say. Are you spending your money for advertising in haphazard fashion as if intended for charity, or do you advertise for direct results?

Did you ever stop to think how your advertising can be made a source of profit to you, and how its value can be measured in dollars and cents. If you have not, you are throwing money away.

Advertising is a modern business necessity, but must be conducted on business principles. If you are not satisfied with your advertising you should set aside a certain amount of money to be spent annually, and then carefully note the effect it has in increasing your volume of business; whether a 10, 20 or 30 per cent increase. If you watch this gain from year to you will become intensely interested in your advertising, and how you can make it enlarge your business.

If you try this method we believe you will not want to let a single issue of this paper go to press without something from your store.
